for certain hours alike until fuch time as their own westines and the faintness of their horses para sed the battail in doubtful victory. Of the Macedonians there died 40 horfemen and of the Romans five and thirty. And for all this meither brought the Macedonians any better intelligence to their King, nor the Romans to their Conful, of the place where the enemies were incamped, But certain figurive traitors gave advertisement thereof who commonly in all wars, upon a tubning head and light humon't that naturally they have, are given to heatken often they among engine in what terms enemies fland. Philip imagining that it would avail somewhat both to purchase the affectionar love of his fouldiers, and also to induce them more cheerfully and readily to undertake all hazards for his fake, in case he seemed to have a careful regard to bury those horsemen which were flain in the journey and expeditionaforefaid commanded their bodies to be brought into the camp to the end that all men might fee what honour he did them in their finerals. But fee how nothing is more uncertain nor whereof a man may make lefs reckoning than the minde and affections of the multitude. That which was thought would have made them more willing and forward to enter into any danger and jeopardy what loever, even that, wrought a contrary effect and caused them to be most fearful and backward. For they who were used to fight with Greeks and Illyrians, and to fee mens bodies wounded with push of pike, galled with arrows and pierced with lance here and there, in this or that part after they beheld once their fellows to but-cherly mangled with the Spanish curtelases and arming swords, the arms curaway from the body, the heads either imitten clean off by the neck, or cloven down right, and lying on the fhoulders; their pariches tipe with the bowels open, and guts drawing after; with other deep wounds and broad flathes, most hideous and fearful to behold; then they faw allful well (fearful creatures & as they were) what mannet of weapons, and what kind of men they were to deal against Navahe King himself was terribly afraid, who had not as yet encountred with the Romans in any fet field. Whereupon he tent for his fon, to come back with the garrifon that he had in the freights of Pen Lagonia, thereby to increase and firengthen his own forces: and so laid open the way into Macedomiasfor Pleur atus and the Dardanians. Himfelf in person with a power of 20000 soot, and 4000 horse, guided by the sugitives abovesaid, marched toward the enemy, and about a quarter of a mile or somewhat less from the Roman camp, possessed himself of a little hill neer to Athacum, which he fortified with trench and rampier. From whence, when he beheld the Romans encamped hard under him, he wondered (by report) to see not only the whole body of the camp, with the form and order thereof ingeneral, but also how every part was ranged and let out inseveral, to both in the manner, of quartering and pitching their pavilions, and allo in the proportion of the wayes for breadth and length between And having viewed and confidered every thing accordingly: "Believe me (ad he) there is no man who feeth this, that can either think or fay, it is the camp of abarbarous nation. For two daies space the Consul and the King (expecting one anothers atrempts and enterprises) kept their fouldiers close within their holds. When the thirdday was come, the Roman General brought forth his whole power into the field, But the King feating to hazard all fo foon spon a cast, drew forth 400 Triballians (which were, as we have faid eliewhere, of the Illyrian nation) and 300 Cretenfians, all footmen, accompanied with the like number of horsemen; and sent them under the conduct of Athenagorid, one of his courtiers and gallants, for to brave the Cavalry of the enemies, and to challenge them to fight. The Romans, whole a main battail was little above half a mile off, put out against them their light armed van-curriers and as it were, two companies or cornets of horfemen: to the end, that they might be equa with the enemy in number, both of foot and horse. They of the Kings part supposed verily, that they should fight aftertheir old and accustomed manner: namely, that the horsemen should by turns, one while ride forward in the face of the enemy, other while retire again; fornetime follow in chase and have use of their darts and weapons, and sometimes turn and shew their back parts that the nimbleness and activity of the Illyrians would fland in good flead to make excursions and fuddain skirmishes; also that the Cretensian archers should be emploied in shooting arrows aloof at the enemies, as they advanced and came forward, or flung out all abroad on every fide: but the violent charge of the Romans, no less continual and obstinat than sierce and eager, put N them quite out of this manner of fervice, and disordered all. For no otherwise than if it had been a fet battail between two entire armies, their footmen lightly armed, fo foon as they had lanced and let go their javelins from them, took them to their fwords, and came to hand fight: the horsemen likewise, no sooner affronted the enemies, but either staying their horses they sought on horseback, or else alighted on foot, and among the footmen maintained the skitmish. By this means neither the Kings Cavalry could match the Romans, because they had not been used to & fleady battel; nor his footmen who were wont to traverse their ground, and skirmish, never standing still, and withal in manner half naked for any harness they had, was able to make their parts good with the Roman light appointed footmen, who had their fwords and bucklers, and were furnished with armour, as well defensive as offensive. So they could not endure long to O' maintain fight, but were forced to retire into their camp, and by nothing elfelaved themselves but by good footmanship and riding apace. These passed one day between, when the King minding to trie a conflict with all his forces of Cavalry, and footmen lightly appointed, had laid in await by night certaintargatiers, whom they call Pelisifa, in a covenient place between both camps, and given direction and charge unto. Ashenagoras and his men of arms, That if they speed well in open bartel and plain fight, they should on fill and follow their good fortune : but if they went by the

A worse, and were too weak, they should give ground by little and little, and train the enemy to the place of ambush. Well, it fell out so, that the storiemen indeed seried accordingly, but the leaders place of amount.

of that cohort aforefaid of targatiets, not attending the fighal long enough but rating their men out of ambush before time, lost the opportunity of playing their part to performing a goodfervice.

The Roman Gonial having both obtained victory in open partel, and chaped the danger of a covert trains, serired himself into his camp. The morrow after he came down into the plain field with all his forces, and put them in battel array, having arranged his Elephants in the forefront of the vingard. And this was the first time that ever the Romans had use in their wars, of this the stage of the sugard. And this was the first time that ever the roomans had he in their wars, of this mies. But perceiving that Philip kept himlest follow within his camp, he approached under the very then be drawn to a battel tronsidering also, that if he kept there a flanding camp longs ones much to the enemy, his provision of corn flouid be exposed to dangers; for no looner should the pure to the enemy, his provision of corn flouid be exposed to dangers; for no looner should the pure stages and foreagers he gains abload in the stage country. veyors and forragers be gone abroad into the countrey, and fixed over the fields, but the enemies light hofemen would be ready at their heels to fetch them in, and caule them to come fhort home: therefore he removed his camp to a place almost eight miles off, called Octolophum, where he might make his provision with less danger. Now when the Romans purveied for corn and victuals in the territory thereabout, and were come upon a time somewhat neer and within danger of Philip, at first the King jet them alone, and kept his men within their camp, to the end, that they might be more bold and venturous, and withal, led wary and circumspect: but espying C them once straighing a funder here and there out of order, he set torward with all his Cavalry, and the auxiliaries of the Candiors, and marched fo faft, as the (wifted of his footmen by running might keep pace with the horiemen: thus having gottenbetween them and home, he pitched down his enfigns betwist the Roman camp and the fortagers. Then divided he his forces in two companies, the one he sent forth to course and chase them, so dispetied as they were ; giving special charge and direction, not to leave any of them alive that they could reach with the other he flaied himfelf behind, and befet all the waies, and stopped the passages by which the enemies were like to retire and have recourse unto their camp. Sobn were they killed or put to flight in every place, and as yet not one escaped so the Roman camp, for to bring news of this disconfiture; for as many as fled back-chatted upon the guard that the King had set; and more were slainby them as many as nee paractuanced upon the guard that the range manter and more well hanney them. D that befor the waies, than thole that were gir our to the purfuir and execution. At length some happed to escape through the midth of the kings corp de gaird, and in great hast and searful manner came into the camp with a troubletone noise and tunuils, rather than any certain tidings. The Conful, after order given to the horlemen, that every man should incour and refue what way foever he could, their distressed fellows in this extremity, himself led forth the legions out of the camp, and marching in a fouriquare battaillon advanced toward the enemies. The Horsemen being spred over the fields in divers places, some lost their right way, being deceived by other outcives heard from a contrary part: otherfome met with their enemies, and at one instant, the skirmish began in many and fundry places. The band that guarded about the King, fought most fiercely and cruelly: for both they were for their own number as E well of horse as foot, a full army welneer; and also most of the Romans light upon them, becaule they kept the very port and rodeway in the mids. . In this regard allo were the Macedonians the better and had the vantage, because the King himself was present in person to encourage and exhort them: and withal the auxiliary Candiots wounded many of the Romans erethey were aware of them: for why, they were well prepared aforehand, ranged thick and clode together, and fo fought against them that rode scartering abroad one from another, and without artay. And verily, if they could have kept any mean and measure in their chase, they had mightily advanced themselves, not only in winning the honor of that day, but also, in the main point of the whole war. But purfuing them beyond all reason, and without discretion, upon a bloudthirfly desire that they had of massacre, they chanced upon the Roman Squadrons which were gone before with the Tribuns and Colonels! in to much as the Horiemen aforefaid, who below fled, when they once faw the entigns of their own infantery, reined their horse head. threed again upon the enemy that ran with bridle in horfe tecks and so in the turning of an hand, the fortune of the battail changed and came about, and they that erewhile made puriute, now shewed their backs, and fled amain, Many of them were slain that came to close handlight, many likewise of those that ran away. Neither fell they all upon the edge of the sword, for some there were who plunged into bogs and marishes, where both horse and man sunk in the deep mud and mire, and so were swallowed up and perished. The King himself also was in great danger: for his hote being wounded under him and fallen, he also came headlong down to the ground, and herdy escaped but he had been troden under soot, and mitchieved as he lay along. One horseman Q abore the rest faved his life, who hastily lept himself from horseback, and withal mounted the King (to feared as he was) promiss own horse: who being now on foot, and not able to run as Yath as the horiemen that fled away, was with many a fish and thrulf foon disparched by the enemies that dame running together to the King when he was seen to fall. And the King after he had ridden in fearith flight about the fensy meers, one while where there was forfie way, and otherwhiles where these was none at all to be feen chanced at length to come to his camp, when most men were in despair that he could possibly scrape in latery. In this skirmish there were 200

Macedonians flain, a hundred almost taken prilopers fourscore brave and goodly coursers, withit reaccounting and other farmiting together with the ipoil of fair amount carred away.

There were that blamed the King for being too rath that day and the Conful for his flackness.

Por Philip, lay they, flould have kept him quiet in rest and repole, knowing, as be did shouth enemies when few dayes would have been brought to extream want and penuny, new that the certificity all about was clean spoiled and wheel. And the Consultor his part, when he had foiled the Cavalry and light armed foundings of the enemies, and as good as taken the King prioner, ought pricently to have advanced against the King camp: for never would the enemies so discomfited have flood to it: and so in the minute of an hour, they had been vanquished for ever. This is foon faid, but (as most things elfe) not fo foon done. For in case that the King had likewise brought forth into the field all his Infantery, peradventure in that sumult, when all his men were r discomfited and driven to flie out of the field to their camp, yea, and to keep within the rampier. for fear of the enemy, ready upon his victory to get over the connecticarp and other fortifications, the King might have been differzed of his hold, and loft all, ... Again confidering, that the whole power of Philip his footmen remained fill intire within the camp, the corps de guard before the gates warding; the fentinels and watch let in convenient places of the rampier attending : what other good should the Consul have done in advancing thither, but imitated the rash fool-hardiness of the King, who a little before so hotly followed the chale of the hors men discomfited? Neither was the Kings first delignment to be reproved and found fault with when he charged upon the foragers, scattered as they were over all the fields: it he could have seen when he was well, and have pied his good hand in measure and moderation. Less marvail it is besides, that we he was willing to trye the fortune of a battail; because there ran a rumor, that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were departed from home, and with a puissant power entred already into Macedons: And if he thus were befet round about with these armies, there was no doubt but the Romans might have vanquished and subdued him, and never stirred foot for the matter. Philip therefore supposing that upon these two late received foils of the horsemen, he should have but unquiet and dangerous fitting in the same standing camp still: and minding to dislodge from thence, and in his remove to beguil the enemy and not be feen, dispatched a Pursevant at arms or herald unto the Conful a little before fun fetting, to grave furcease of arms, until he had buried his horsementhat wereflain: and at the relief of the second watch he deceived the enemy; for leaving many fires through all his camp, he marched without any noise and departed. The Conful had newly supper, and was going to rest, when he was advertise at a Pursevant was come, and what his errandwas. And for the present, he made the more than a new rest of the present, he made the more than a new rest of the supper that the next morning he would talk with him, and give him audience. But Philipby this means got the advantage of the advantage of the supper the supper than the supper that the next morning he would talk with him, and give him audience. But Philipby this means got the advantage of the supper supper than the supper sup tage of that whole night, and part of the next day, to gain riddance of way in his journey, which was the only thing he lought for. And toward the mountains he took his flight, for that way he wiff well the Romans would not follow after, with an army so heavy and charged as it was. The Conful by day break, granted the Purlevant a cellation of arms, and gave him his dispatch : but it was not long after that he was advertised how the enemy was gone; and not knowing which way to follow after, he passed some sew dayes in foraging and purveying provision all about the place where he lay encamped.

After this he marched to Stubera, and gathered together all the grain that was to be had abour Pellagonia. From thence he went forward as far as to Pluvina, and all this while knew not for certain into what quarter of the countrey the enemies were retired. Philip having first fet him down and encamped before Brusna, and departed from thence by crois and crooked wayes, fruck a fuddain fear into the enemy, whereupon the Romans dislodged from Pluvina, and neer theo the River Ofphagus pitched their pavilions. The King likewife rested himself not far from thence, and had cast a trench and raised a rampier along the banks of the River, which the inhabitants call Erigonus. And after he was for certain advertised, that the Romans intended to go to Erduca, he marched afore to feize upon the fireights, and to empeach the enemies, that they should not gain the passage that lyeth as it were in a narrow gullet, barred and enclosed on N each fide. There he raifed in one place a rampier, and cast a trench in another; made barricadoes here and there, partly by piling stones up on heaps in stead of a wall, partly by felling of trees across, according as either the ground would give leave, or the place afford matter: And thus stopping up all the wayes by fundry devices and means, he made the place (to his thinking) both unpassable and impregnable, which of it self by nature was hard enough and troublefome. The countrey all about was for the most part forrests, and full of wood, very incommodious, especially for that manner of battailons and ordnance of array, which the Macedonians call Phalanx: which lerveth them in small or no stead at all, unless with their long pikes they may make a pallisade, or stay (as it were) and oppose them before their shields: which they cannot well do, miles they have free kope and liberty of plain and open ground. The Thracians also were foully troubled and cumbred with their spears named Rhomphaa, which were likewise of a mighty length, and by reason thereof (catching as they did, and snarling within the boughs and branches of Trees that grew in their way every where about) hindred them very much. There remained the Cohort or band of the Candiots, that feemed of some use for to be employed. And yet the same also as it was able to discharge arrows against both Hoyfe and man, and to annoy them to long as they lay open and exposed to shot, if haply they

A offered to charge; to they were not of ffrength sufficient to drive their shafts level, and to pierce chorough the Roman targets: for otherwise there was no part of the body offered it self unarmed and naked for to aim at. And therefore fo foon as they perceived that kind of short o serve them to little or no purpole, they caught up flones which lay all over the vailey, and let them flie at the enemy. Which stones, as they light and beat upon their bucklers, kept a great clattering, and with the found they made (rather than with any hurt besides) kept the Romans for a time from mounting up the bank, But the Romans making no teckoning of these stones neither, partly by pavoites and target-fences over their heads, made way directly through the thickest of their enemies; and partly by wheeling a little and fetching some compats about gained the pitch of the hill, and were got up to the very top : from whence they drave the Macedonians (all affrighted as they were) B down the hill, and cleafed them from their holds and guards; and by reason they had much ado to flie (the ground was fo rough and uneven) most of them were killed and cut in pieces. Thus the difficulty of the freights was overcome, and they were possessed thereof, with far less trouble and conflict than they looked for and made account of. Then they marched on forward as far as to Erdner, where the Conful after he had put the fields all over to the walt, retired himself to Eliman. From thence he forced Orestides, and assailed the Town Celerum, fituate as it were, in a demy lland: there is a lake that environeth the walls, and but one way by land that leadeth to the Town from the main, and the same very streight and narrow, in form of a gullet, At the first when the Town was summoned the inhabitants trusting to the natural strength of the place kept their gates shut against the Consul, and refused his summons. But after they saw once the entigns dis-C played and marching against them; when they perceived the enemies defended under a pavoise to approch close to the gate, and the narrow streight and avenue aforesaid, beset with a band of them; before they would encounter and fight, they yeelded themselves for very sear. From Celetrum he marched ontowards the Dassarettans, and wan by assault the City Pelium. From thence he carried away the bondllaves, with the rest of the pillage but all perions what loever free born he let go at liberty without paying rantom. The Town he gave them again after he had planted in it a firong garrison : for it stood well, and in a very good place, for to make rodes and incursions into Macedony. Thus the Conful having ranged over the countrey of the enemies, brought his army back through the peaceable parts into apollonia; where he began first to make war. Now the Ætoitans the Athamans, and Dardanians, and many other wars riling juddainly at n once, some from one-place and some from another, had diverted and turned Philip a contrary way, Against the Dardanians (as they returned out of Macedony) he sent Achenagoras with the footmen lighty armed and appointed, and the greater parcalfo of the horse giving him in charge and direction to follow them hard at their heels as they departed, and to play upon their backs, and cut off the tail of their reseward; to teach them against another time; nor to be so hasty to come abroad with an army again, Democritus the Pretor of the Ætolians (who in the Diet afore-(aid held at Naupattum perswaded to take a longer time for to consult about this war) had in the next Councel or Parliament following, moved the Ætolians to enterinto arms; namely, upon the fame that was pread abroad of the horsemens fight before Octolophus; and a lo upon the co-uing orthe Dardanians, and Pleurains with the Illyrians into Matedony; besides the arrival of the Roman fleet at Oreum, and the general voice and bruit that went, how Macedary should shortly be affailed also by sea, over & above to many nations that from all parts about were come clready by land. These motives regained Democritus and the Etolians to friend the Romansagain, Who joyning unto them Amininder the King of the Athamans, wentforth together for to heliege Cercinium. They within the Town had shurtheir gates, whether by constraint or willingly of themselves, it was not known for they had the Kings garrido within among them. How ever it wasswithinfe w dayes Gereinium was taken and burnt. As many as remained alive after that great defeat as well bind as free one with another, we're with the rest of the pillage carried away, This fearful example canded all the people inhabiting about the marish of Babe, to abandon their ciries, and to retire themselves for seemey into the mountains. The Etolians for want of F rich prey and booty (which they could not find there) turned from them and marched toward Perrhabia. In that quarter they wor by force the City Cyrene; and cruelly put it to the ramack. The inhabitance of Malles knrendred of themselves without compulsion and were received into protection as allies, One of Perribebea Horinand was of advice and defirous to march against Completed by reason that the countre's of Athamania bordered of neer upon that City, and it foemed saly to before Without much rouble. Burthe Erolians fingers rickled and itched againtrobe duing within a rith and fereile fields of Theffalie; and thither were they to raise booties and feel plinger Abantander followed fill for company, albeit he liked well neither of thefe falhions of the of trolland this outragion by to make rodes and to spoil every where; nor of their manner of excamping accordencine, in what places foever they chanced to come, without all G diddentiony tegardy and care of fortifying and guarding the army. Fearing therefore left their inconsiderate rassmes and supine negligence, might be an occasion that he or his should come to a threwer ante, and intent foline damage, foyed his time; and feeing them to incamp in a plain neer to the Civy Phication; he rook a little Hill little above half a mile off, where both he and his panight with the help of any small guard, lie in security. Now when as the Etolians feemed in manner to have forgotten that they were in the enemies country, but that they drave some booties: whiles they were tome of them wandring and stragling, disbanded and half armed, g effekt er stahe, politis er de staps Milde. others within their camp without any corps du guard, swilling and fleeping all night and day long, H and made no difference of the times, Philip came upon them before they looked for him, And it being once known by the report of some that fled out of the fields in great affright, that he approched; then Damocritus and the rest; of the Captains began to quake for fear. Now was it about noonetide of the day, at what time as most of them having taken their full lode of wine and viands, lay along fast affeep. Then they fell to awake and raise one another, and to give the alarm: anon they sent out every way to call in those that were spreading abroad in the fields. So much they were aftonied, that for haft many of the horsemen went forth without their iwords, and most of them forgat to put on their cuiraces. Thus being led out in post hast, and hardly in all (foot and horsetogether) able to make up the number of fix hundred, they light upon the Kings Cavalry, for number, armour, and courage much better than themselves ; And therefore at the first r push were discomfited: for before they were well entred into skirmish, they fled shamefully away toward their camp. Some of them came short thither, and were either slain or taken prisoners, even as many as the Kings horsemen overtook, and gat between them and their other companies. Philip, when he saw his men approch neer unto their camp, commanded to sound the retreat: for both horse and man was weary, not so much with fight as with their long journey and the exceeding speed that they made. Whereupon he gave commandment, that the Horsemen by troops, and the light armed Footmen by their companies and Squadrons should water their horses one after another, and go to their dinner and repast. Others he kept still in armour for a guard attending the Regiment of the footmen, that came but flowly forward, by reason they were heavily armed at all pieces; who being come, they also were enjoyned to pitch down their enfigns, and lay their weapons before them, and to take a short bait and hasty pittance, sending two or three at the most out of every band for to water the horses. All this while the horsemen, together with the light armed fouldiers, stood well appointed and in readiness, if haply the enemy would have given any attempt. The Ætolians bestowed armed men all about the gates and the rampier, intending to guard and defend their strength and fortifications, for now by this time they also that were scattered over the fields, had retired themselves into the camp. And so long as they beheld the enemies to keep quiet, and not fir, and were themselves in a sure hold, they made their bravadoes, and were very lufty: but after that the entigns of the Macedonians began to advance forward, and march in order of battel well appointed, close unto their trench; all at once they abandoned their guards and quarters, and ran out at the back part of their camp, and fled to the foresaid hill, where the Athamanians were encamped. Many of the Etolians were likewise in this hasty flight killed or taken prisoners. Philip made no doubt, but that the Athamanians also might have been driven from their hold, if there had been day enough behind: but the day being ipent already first in the skirmish, and afterward in the ransacking of their camp, he fet him down upon the next plain, hard at the foot of the hill aforesaid, intending very early the next morning to affail the enemy. The Ærolians scared as much now, as they were before when they quit their own camp, fled scattering away the night following. Here Aminander flood them in very good flead, by whose good guidance and direction, the Athamanians being skilful in the coasts of the country, conducted them into Etolia, over the high mountains, whereas the enemies followed after them in blind and unknown by-wayes. Some few of them M hapned in this confused and scattered flight to lose their way, and stumble upon the Macedonian horsemen, whom Philip by day light, had sent to cut off the tail of the enemies, so soon as he perceived the hill abandoned. About the very same time, Athenageras a Captain under the King, overtook the Dardanians as they returned into their country, and at the first put their reerward in difarray. But afterward the Dardanians turned head again, and embattelled themselves: so they fought on even hand, and nothing was won nor loft on any fide. The Dardanians began not fo foon to advance forward and march on again, but the Kings power, with their horsemen and light armed fouldiers came upon them afresh, and put them to great trouble. For they had no such means of help, and were besides surcharged with heavy armour, and withal, the place gave great advantage to those of the Kings part. Very sew were slain, more wounded, none at all taken pri- N foners: for the manner of the Dardanians, is not to break out of their ranks and arraies for a little, and upon small occasions; but as they fight closes o they retire together, and part not. Thus Philip having restrained these two nations, by two brave exploits, which were as happily performed as bravely enterprised, recovered the losses again, by him received in the Roman war. There happed befides, another occurrent, which diminished the number of his enemies the Atolians, For Sopas, one of the chief noblemen of that nation, being tent from Alexandria by King Prolomans, with a mighty mass of gold, caried away with him into Agype fix thousand footmen, and certain horsemen, waged for mony to serve. Neither had helest behind him any of the flour and youth of Ætolia, if Damocritus had not chastised and rebuked them, and so by that means kept some of them at home; making remonstrances unto them, one while of the war that was toward, and another o while of the defolation which was like to enfue thereupon. But whether he did this upon a good zeal and care that he had of his countrey, or only to crofs Scopas, because he had not fed him well with rich rewards and fat presents, it is not known. And thus much concerning the affairs passed between Philip and the Romans for that summer.

The Roman fleet having in the beginning of the same summer committed to Sea from Corcyra, together with the Lieutenant Au. Apustius passed beyond the point of the cape Malea, and A joined with King deadly deer Soldann in the territory of Harmon Then the whole City and some country and supersonable present all and factors for the one and pointed forth at once will fill for factor and make all control and once will file that ed and make which show had conserved against Philips and which a long time for very rear they had held in, and therefore kept elicance was a good shall reasonable terms with him. Now in this Consthere never want prompt and ready tongues to the up and provoke the common people to a commotion, And as in all the States generally fitch kind of men are entertained and bosn our by the favour of the multitude; fo in Mibers especially, where elequence is in most requeft, and beareth greatest sway. Presently therefore an AR was put up and proposed into the common people, and by them granted and confirmed, That all the Statues and Images of King Philip, together with cheircitles and filles, likewife of all his progenitors and predeceffors, as

B well men as women, should be defaced, palled down, and destroied. Item, That all the festival daies, the factifices and factificers, which had been instituted and ordained for the honor of him, should be prefaned and unhallowed again; Isim, That the very places, wherein ought had been erected, or inscriptions gravers to his honour, should be held as detertable and accurred : and that from thence forward, it might not be lawful to fet up there any of those things that ought to fland, and be dedicated in a pure and clean place. Item, That the publick Priests of the City, in all their praiers, and so often as they praied for the good efface of the people of Ashens and their allies, for the prefervation of their armies and armadoes; should detect and cure by name King Philip, his children and realm, his forces both by land and fea, with all the race and name of the Macedonian nation, Moreover, it ran on in the decree, That if any manfrom that timeforward, C would prefer and propound any thing that might tend to the diffrace and infamie of Philip, the whole people of Ashens should approve and allow the same whatsoever, and make an act thereof, Contrary-wife, if any person say or do anything for honour, or to impeach and check his difhonour, who foever should happen to kill the said parry, he should be deemed and reputed, that he had killed him justly and lawfully. Finally, this branch was comprised within the decree, That all things ordained in times past against Psiffranch his line and progeny, should be observed and stand in force against Philip. Thus verily warred the Athenians against Philip with letters and words: wherein they are right valiant, and to ay truth, good at nothing elfe. But Airdin and the Romans, having from Hermiona shaped their course for Pyreaum, arrived there. And after they had so journed some sew daies in Asheris, and were loden with a number of decrees, where-D in the Athenians recounted the praises and commendations of their allies beyond all measure, like as they had before exceeded in thewing their malice against their enemies; they fet tail from Pyreaum to Andro. Where, siding a anchor withe bay called Ganrelson, they fent certain men to found the minds of the inhabitants, Whether they would think to yeeld the Town willings, or rather abide the hazard of a forcible affault. Who unlivered again, that the Kings garrifon being possessed of the Castle, and keeping it for Philip, they were not their own masters. Whereupon the King and the Roman Lieutenant set their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines and artillery fit for an affault, approached the City divers swales. The Roman standards and their' arms, not leen before in those parts, the resolute courage also of the souldiers, who so shall and analed the Greeks, much more than any thing

E elle. Therefore immediatly they flewinto the Caftle, vand the enemies were LL. of the City. Now, after they had for two daies space held out in the fortress, presuming more upon the strength of the place than the force of their armout and weapons: they and the garrifon together, compounded upon the third day to quit the place, fo they might be brought with a convoy to Delium, a Town in Bania, and every manto have one fingle fait of apparel. Then the Romans leaving the bare Ciry unto King Assalius, sanlacked it themselves, and took away with them all the pillage and ornaments that beautified the same. And to the end, that the Isle should not lie wast and defart, Astalus perswaded the Macedonians in manner all, and certain also of the Andrians, there to remain. Afterwards, they also who by composition were transported to Delians, were by the fair promises of the King drawn away from thence: which they gave ear and credit

R unto the sooner, for the lave of their native country themils whereof they might hardly brook. From Andres they croffed to Gythms. There they four certain daies in a salking the City, to no purpole; and seeing the gains would hardly quit their pains, they departed from thence, Neer unto Prafie (which is a place of Arres within the main) there joined unto the Roman fleet twenty pinnaffes of the Islams, who were sent to rob and spoil the territory of the Carystians : the rest of the fleer remained at Gereftum, a noble rode and port of Enbua, until fuch time as the Islai were. returned from Caryfums. Then all together they made fail, and pating the mids of the main less they fell with the Isle of Jews, neer unto Sopras, There they were staid for certain daies, by reason of the saging Northwind: which being once laid and the sea calm again; they passed to Seymbol a City lately pulled and ransacked by K. Philip. The souldiers ranged over the country, and brough:

@ Com with them to their ships & whattoever else was firformass food, Other booty peither was there any, nor deserved had the Greeks to be spoiled at shell hands. Thence they bent their course for Caladres & first they code at anthor neer unto Mendo; willage fituat by the fea fide, and belonging to that State. From whence having failed beyond the cape to defrous to come about with their welfels for to approach the very walls of the City, there grofe a temper to foldain golf; wherin they had like to have been cast away: but scattered they were stander: & having for the most part loft the tacking of their ships, they escaped with much ado so land. This tempest at ses, was also a fore-token grefaging men them, that they were to follow the weeky Lundaughts fluorism for at ferrice. For when they had brought all she is things together and its about more all one) they affailed the Town: Dut, they had the, repulle with many, ablondy blow beides (for there washing, is fired grant from our they have been any they are they a for Acenthus. There as first they intraged the territory steen forcestshe Town and rankeded it And for that their flains had their hall fraught and charge populage shey failed no farther forward. but returned from whence they came to Seyathus; and from thence to Enbug where leaving hehind them their main navy, shey pur in with ten thips lightly appointed, to the Buyor cult of Males, forto parley with the Atolians about the whole course and managing of the wars. The chief of this embaffage fent from the State, was one Signir biosian Abolian, who came to Here I clea for to treat and confer about the caffairs together with the King and the Roman Lieutenant They demanded of Assalus by vertue of the accord and agreement before made, to furnish them with a thousand souldiers : for so many ought he by zight to set out and maintain; when sever they were to wage war against Philip. But this demand was denied to the Etolians; in regard that aforetime they likewife thought much to make a rode to spoil Macadany, at what time as Phi-Lip kept foul work about Pergamus, burning all edifices before him, as well facred as prophane. when they might have drawn him perforce from thence into his own realm to look unto his proper affairs there. Thus the Erolians were dismiffed with more hope than help: for the Romans fed them only with fair words, and large promifes of all things. Then apalias with King Attalus returned to the fleet.

After this they laid their heads together, and began to confult about the fiege and affault of Oreum. A firong City this was both in regard of the walls, and alforof a good garrifon by realon that heretofore it had been once affailed. Now there were 20 fail of Rhodian ships ell close covered with hatches and decks, which under the conduct of Captain Ageimbround had lovned with the fleet of Attalus and the Romans after the winning and conquest of Andros. These ships they sent to lie in the Bay of Zelasium, (a promontory or cape above the City Demerrius, lying very conveniently over against Isthmia) for this intense that if the Macedonian ships should come abroad from thence, they might be ready in gard to make fail against them. Heraelidenati Admiral for King Philip, lay there at rode; with the may, attending rather fome enterprise by oppor-tinity and vantage of the enemies aggligence, than opplish and open force. The Rodans and L Account the mean time planted their ordnance against Orium at divers parts. The Romans at the Caffle fide that flandeth upon the Sea: The King from the vale that lieth between two forts, where as the City is enclosed also with a wall. And as the wastailed in fundry places; so their manner of affailing was much different, and their engins divers. The Romans affayed to approach the wall with tortoiles, pavoiles and mantiless, and to thake it with the Ram: They of the Kings part used Crossbows, Balists, Cataptits, and all manner of enfigue to shoot forth quarels and darts, yea, and to level and weigh mights some of exceeding great weight. They undermined alfo: and in fum, they practifed all means which they faw by experience did good during the former affault and fiege. But the Macedonians were not only more in number than the time before to defend the City but also of better courage and resolutions by reason that the King had rebuked M them tharply for their fault passed and they remembred well both his menaces, and also his promiles for the time to come: in fo much as the affailants had small hope to win the Town in haft. Mean while the Roman Lientenant, supposing that some other exploit might be performed, leaving a fufficient number (as he thought) for the finishing of the Fabricks begun, and other engins of affault, put over to the next places of the continent: where he surprised on a suddain Lariffa (not that noble and renowned City in The faly, but another, which they call Cremafe) and won it, all but the fattress. Assalus in like fort took Ageleon, fearing nothing less than such an accident from them that werebusie in besieging another Town. By this time, as the engins and other Fabricks without Oreass were at the point of finishing, and ready to perform the battery for which they were made: fo the garrison within was overroiled with continual pain N and travail, spent with watching night and day, and faint with many a grievous wound. Moreover, part of the wall, shaken underneath with a butt and push of the Ram, was already fallen down in fundry places, in so much as the Romans entred by night at the open breaches, and all the way above the Key, and so were possessed of the Castle. Attalas likewise by the break of day, after he faw the banner reared upon the forcress, and the fignal which the Romans pur forth, entred the City; for now the walls in many places lay along. The garrifon and the Townsmen fled to a second citadel that they had, from whence after two dayes they yeelded. The City was the Kings lot: the bodies of the prisoners were the Romans share. New drew the sun user unto the Equinoctial line in Autumn, at what time the Eubocan gulf called Calls is dangerous, and not well truffed of mariners. Therefore being definous to be gone into a place of fate retreat; be-O fore the troublelome winter weather overtook them, they turned their course and made head to Pyracum, from whence they came; where Apultius leaving behind him thirty ships, fet a compais about the cape of Malea, and failed to Coreyra. But the King stayed still so long as the festival dayes of Correspondinged, because he would be present at the celebration of those solemnities. Alter the feast ended, himself likewise cerired into Asia: but first he sent Agesimbratus and the Rhadianshome again. These were the afairs and exploits performed this summer by sea and land,

A by the Roman Conful and the Lieuten ant Generall, with the aid of King Attalua and the Rhodians, against King Philip and his allies.

The other Conful C. Awelina being come into his Province when the war was brought to an end, could not smother and conceale his anger conceived against the Practor for sighting in his absence. When he had taken order therefore to send him into Etymia, himself with the legions so more prev than praise. But L. Frague sering these was read to as he got more prey than praile. But L. Furius, leeing there was little to do in Etruria, and withall defirous rather than his life of a triumph over the Gauls (which he supposed to obtain with more ease, whiles the Contul was absent, who was both angry with him, and also envied at him arrived at Rome before any man looked for him, and affembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellong, Where, B after he had declared what acts he had atchieved, he requelled that he might be permitted to ride into the City with triumph. In great credit and account he was with many of the Senators. both for his noble and worthy deeds, in which regard they honoured him: and also for aspeciall favour and love, in which respect they affected him. But the more ancient and elder Senators denied him triumph, as well for that he had warred with the army of another, as also because he had abandoned his own Province and government, upon a greedy defire to catch a triumph, by waiting his opportunity, and taking advantage: a thing not warrantable by any former precedent or example: And as many of them as had been Consulstaid moreover. That above all things he ought to attend upon the Conful his return. "For well might he (fay they) being encamped near unto "the City, have delended and guarded the Colony only, and so have drawn the time out untill C & his coming, and never needed to have fought a let battell for the matter. And although the Pro-"tor have omitted to to do, yet ought not the Senat to follow his example, but expect the Con-"ful. When as therefore they have heard the Conful and Prætor discoursing and arguing the

"matter both together face to face, then they flowle be able to judge better and more foundly
"of the cau'e, A great part of the house was of opinion that they ought to look unto nothing elle but the good fervice done, and whether he were lawfully called thereunto, as a Magistrate of

"fine fire like to leap from it to the other so near, (as from house to house that joyn together)
"what could the Prator have done otherwise in that case? For if there might be nothing attemps"

"house and tace of the Furit. By these and such like remonstrances alledged by himself and his friends, the engiety of the Consul absent was over-weighed with the favour born to the Pretor present. And so in a frequent assembly of Sepators a decree was granted. That L. Furius should "fide intriumph. Thus triumphed dee's the Galba." Legicity Faster, while he have in "

Fride intriumph. Thus triumphed over the Galls. L. Furius Prator, whiles he was in office. He brought into the common treasury 320000 Affes; 170000 pound weight of filver. But neither were there any pritoners led captives in the was or spoils carried in pomp before his chariot, nor yet his fouldiers followed after. So as it appeared, that all other things besides victory alone, pertained properly to the Consul.

After this were the plaies exhibited wintergreat magnificence by P. Cornelius Scipio, which he had viwed in Affrick, during his Comulthip. Also there passed an order for the lands of his foodings; That for so long as each one had served in Spain or Affrick, he should have two acress for every year; and that these lands should be set out and assigned unto them by ten Decreased for the purpose departed. Then were certain Triumvirs created for to supply and make out of the Roman Inhabitants in Vinasa, by reason that during the time of Annibal his state, slag, strength of that Colony was much ensembled and impaired. C. Terenius Vinasa, the strength of that Colony was much ensembled and impaired. C. Terenius Vinasa, the strength of that Colony was much ensembled the more considerable strength.

The lame year C. Cornelius Cethegas, who governed Spain as Pro-Conful, discomfited a great holf of the enemies in the country of the Sedetans. In which battell, by report, were lain 15000 Spaniards, and 78 military enfigus taken. C. Amelius the Conful, when he was returned out of his Province to Rome against the solemn election of Magistrates, complained, not as men H out of his Frovince to Julia and one of That the Senat expected not for his coming, not that the Conful was not permitted to debate the matter with the Pretor) but found himself greyed, "That the Senat had decreed a triumph fo, as the party only was suffered to speak who was to trisemment and none of them might be heard who were prefent at the battell. And whereas our fore-"fathers ordained, that Lieutenants, Colonels, Marshals, and Centurions, yea, and in one word " thefouldiers should be at a triumph; for this end and purpose, that the truth might appearto "the world, of al things archieved by him unto whom to great honour was to be done: Was there er any one (quoth he) of all that army which fought with the Gauls, I fay not a fouldier, but fo much as a lackey or horse boy following the Camp, of whom the Senat might enquire, whe-"ther the Prator ipake true orfalle? This done and faid he published the day of affembly for they election abovesaid: wherein were created Consuls L. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Villius Tappulus. After them were Przetors chosen L. Quintius Flaminius, L. Valerius Flacens, L. Villius Tappulus and C. Bebius Pamphilus. Grain and other victuals that year were cheap. Great ftore of corn was at dob fler! brought out of Affrick, which the Ædiles of the chair diffributed to the people, at * two Affers Modius. They also set forth the Roman games and pattimes right sumptuously; yea, and reprefented them one day more than ordinary. Moreover, of the filver raifed by fines and forfeitures. they made feven brazen statues, which they fet up in the treasure-house of the City. The Plebeian plaies likewife were thrice renued all over by the Ediles of the Commons L. Terentins Massaliora, and C. Bebius Pamphelus Prætor elect. Finally, the funerall games that year were four daies together exhibited in the common place of the City, occasioned by the death of M. Valerius Levie K nus: and celebrated they were by his two fons P. and M. who also shewed unto the people a brave spectacle of sencers at the sharp: wherein there were five and twenty couples that entred the lifts and performed combat, M. Aurilius Cotta, one of the Decemvirs, that year departed this life; and in his place M. Acilius Glabrio was subordained. In the solemn affembly for electing R. diles of the chair, is chanced that those two which were chosen might not immediately enter into office : for C. Cornelius Cethegus was created in his absence, whiles he governed the Province of Spain, And C. Valerius Flaceus who was present at his ownelection, might not be sworn to maintain the laws because he was the Flamin or Priest of Jupiter. For lawfull it was not for any Magifrate to exercise his place above five daies, unless he were tworn to the laws. Then Flacent preferred a petition that he might be dispensed with : whereupon the Senat ordained, That if the £-1. dile would find one to swear in his name at the good pleasure and discretion of the Consuls, then the Confuls (if they thought it meet) should deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, to propound it unto the people that it might pass under their grant. So L.Valerius Flacous (the Prator elect for the year following) was presented to take the oath for his brother. Then the Tribunes put it to a canvale before the people, and they enacted. That the oath of his brother should be of the same validity as if the Ædile himself had taken it in his own person, Concerning the other R.diles also there passed an act of the Commons, For when the Tribunes proposed unto the people, Which two they would have to go into Spain as LL. deputies, with command over the armies ; the people ordained, that C. Cornelius the Ædile of the chair might come home to bear his office and L. Manime also after so many years, depart out of his Province: the people ordained, M. that Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Stertinius should have the conduct and government in Spain in quality and title of Pro-Confuls;

Any strange and prodigious sights (as they were reported from divers countries) are here related and set down: among which, this is one, that in Maccelony there was a bay tree sprung my of it self in the poop of a galley. To Quintius slaminius the Conful slowes fortunately against Phillip is the streights of Epitus: and having put him to slight, he compelled him to return into his own kinglam. Himself, with the assistance of the Actions and Athanahas, insighted fore and played Thessay, which be defended by the aides Kinglam. Himself, with the assistance of the Actual were received into amits, The conspiratory of slaves, that completes to deliver and set a large the hospassion the Carthagimans, was decetted and took no effect. The number of Frezers was encreased to ske The Gonful Cornelius Cethegus descarde the French insubstrans in battell. League and amits was concluded between the Ramane and the Lacedamonians, with their syrant Nabis. Over and besides, there is compared and this book the winning of many Cities in Maccelony.

Hen the Confin and Prators were entred into office upon the * Ides of March, they * 15 of March, cast lots for the government of the Provinces. To L.Lensulus, fell It.d; and to P. Prillis and C. Bebias the government of Ariminum; L. Valerius ruled Sicily, and L. Prillius and C. Bebias the government of Ariminum; L. Valerius ruled Sicily, and L. Prillius his foe was to command Sardinia. Lensulus the Conful had order given him to levy new legions and side of the province and included the conful had order given him to levy new legions and licence to take up as many louddlers as he thought good himself to furnish the fame with a fresh inpply. Those legions which C. Aurelius Conful had in charge, were affigued over to Babius the Prator, with condition to keep them with him, untill the Conful were arrived in France with a new army; and to soon as he came, to discharge and dismisse allies: for a for the conful read of the conful were arrived in Prance with a rew sumy; and to soon as he came, to discharge and dismisse allies: for a formuch as this number was thought sufficient to govern the Province about Ariminum.

The Pretors of the former year continued fill Commanders of their armies. Cn. Sergius was enjoyned to fee and take order, that certain lands should be fet out for those souldiers who had ferved many years together in Spain, Italy, and Sardinia. And Q. Minutus had in charge togo through with that inquisition of certain conspirators and traitors in the Brutians country, upon which he had fitten already as Prætor with great fidelity and diligence : and also to send unto Locrifor to receive due punishment of those prisoners, whom being attained and convicted of sacriledge, he had fent bound to Rome. And finally, to cause all the treasure taken out of the Temple of Proferpina, to be restored thither again, with an over-encrease, to make satisfaction and to raze out the wicked part committed. The Latine feafts and holy-daies were folemnized again by vertue of an ordinance of the Bilhops, upon this occasion, That certain Emballidors from Ardea complained in the Senat, how they had not their ordinary allowance of flesh at the Latine seasts aforelaid in the mount Alba, according to the old custome. News came from Sueffa, that two of their City gates, and all the wall between, was mitten with lightning. Messengers also from Formie reported that their Temple of Jupiter was likewise blasted. Moreover, they of Osia brought word of the like mischance with them in the Church of Jupiter. And from Velitra tidings came of the like mishap, fallen upon the Temples of Apollo and Sangus. And that in the Temple of Herculas there fpring up a bush of hair. Letters came also from Q. Minutius the Pro-Practor out of the Brutians country, that there was a colt foled with five feet, and three chickens hatched with three feet speece, After all this, P. Sulpitius the Pro-Prator fent letters from out of Macedony, containing among other matters this news, that there was a Laurell tree grew of it self in the poop

The Senar in regard of all the former prodigious fights, ordained, that the Conful should satisfice fichies the stist unto what gods he thought good: but about this last rehearsed, the Sooth-sitest that pry into 'deaths inwards, were sent into the Senar-house; and by direction of their answer, an Edict vietn forth, That the people should go in procession, and make supplications one day, and in all Temples and Altars of the gods there were sacrifices celebrated with great devotion.

The Carchaginians this year came to Rome with the first payment of the tribute imposed upon them : and for a much as the treasurers and receivers of the City made report, that the filver was not good and lawful, and being brought to thetrial, was found too light by one fourth part washed away thole Carthaginians were constrained to take up money of the bankers of Rome, and to make good the defect and loss of the filver abovefaid. They put up a petition besides unto the Sense that it might stand with their good pleasure to ze-deliver now their hostages. Whereupon an hundred of them were rendred back, and good hope there was of the reft, if so be they conti-I mied to sail and faft in their alleageance, And when they made a farther requelt in behalf of those holdage which were not delivered that they might be tramported from Norba (where they were nor to their good liking and case) to some other place, granted it was, that they might remove to Signia and Ferentinum. In like fort, the Gaditansmade numble fuit, and obtained this liberty, that there fould not be sent from the Romans acaptain to govern Gades, any thing to the conriary in their coveright feonchaded with L. Martine Septimins, when they yielded themselves under the inbjection of the Romans) notwithflanding. Moreover, forafmuch as the Embafladors of Nation made complaint, that they had not their full number of inhabitants, and that there were eerath frangers entermingled among them, not of their own nation, who bare themselves as Co-bridges, therefore L. Committee the Conful was commanded to create three Deputies or Commit-Gibras called Triumvirs for to reform this diforder And chosen there were for this purpose, Pubthought Seffins Elins, who had both of them the firmame of Parus, and C. Corneline Lentulus. This dise was granted to them of Norma, was denied to the Embaffadors of Coffa, who likewife requences that the number of their inhabitants might be encreased.

The Mairs thus findined at Rome that there were to bedone, the Confuls went into their several profiles. P. Missio (2001 as he was arrived in Macedon), was welcomed at his first coming with a different minimum of the sound of the foundates, which long a fore being kindled, was not well quenched at the first beginning. These were those two thousand, which after the defeat of Annibal, were H fent out of Affrick into Sicily; and from thence, a year after almost, transported into Macedons for voluntary fouldiers: but they themselves food froutly to it, that it was no voluntary act of theirs, but that they were shipped by their Colonels and Tribunes full against their wills. And howfoever it was, whether they ferred willingly or unwillingly, it was but meet and good reason. that the time of their fouldiery should run out, and their service have an end at length, Allesians, that for these many years they had not seen Italy; that they waved old men under their harnes, having born arms in Sicily in Affrick and in Macedony; that with toil and travel fo tedious, they were weak and feeble; and after so many wounds and hurts received, they had no more bloud to lofe. The Conful made them answer, that their cause was good and reasonable, but marred in the handling; and meet hethought it, that they should be dismissed, if they could have requested it I in modest terms: but neither it, nor any cause else whatsoever was warrantable to make a mutiny and sedition. Therefore, if they could be content to keep to their colours, and be at command as loyalliouldiers, he would in their behalf write his letters unto the Senat, as touching their conce and dism shon: for be they well assured, that they shall get more by sober and gentle behaviour. than by any fuch Hubborn, troward, and wilfull demeanor.

The fight of

At the same time Philip : fluiled the City of Thaumaci with terraces & mantelets in all forcible manner, fo that he was now at the point to batter & shake the wall with the ram, But the sudden arrival of the Eto in enforced him to furcease his enterprise; who by the conduct of Archidamus having passed through the midst of the Macedonian guards, & entred the town never ceased day nor night to make tallies fath, one while upon their flanding watch, otherwhiles upon their K fabricks & engins. The natural fituation of the place yielded them good help and vantage: for the town of Thaum co is leated on high to amans thinking as he goeth from Pyla & the guiph of Ma-Lea by the way of Lania & sheweth it self aloft, seeming to overlook & command the streightbasdage of the forcests called (al . Again, when one travelieth over the craggy places and the crocked waje entangled with to many windings in the vallies of The flah, and is approached once near to the City Than-the City ali on a judden he may discover before him a mighty large and open plain, as it were a wide and vaff fea forsaman shall have much ado to reach with his eye to tar as these downs we our every way under himsand see all over them. And herenpon by reaton of this stange and marvellous prospect, the City is called 'Thaumagi, Over and besides that the high grounds affordeth it security, it standeth also upon a huge rock, divided into divers crags and broken cliss. Thesel. or wonderfull. difficulties forced Philip toggive over his attempt. and namely, when he confidered and weighed withall, that the town it felf when it was won would not quit the painful labour, and pay for the danger about it. Besides the winter was now at hand, when he departed from thence, and retired his forces into M. acedon, there to harbor. Where, when all others, during the time that they could catch any repose and rest, refreshed their spirits and bodies with some recreations and disports; Phylip only how much relpit foever he had, either of intermission or remission from continual labour of marching in journey, and fighting in battell; to much more trouble he had in his mind whiles he couried and discoursed with himself, what the total and finall issue might be of this war: whiles he food not only in fear of the enemies, which perfecuted him by fea and land, but also in doubt, as well of the hearts of his allies, as of the affections of his own tubjects: left the one in hope M of the Romans friendship should revolt, and the other (even the Macedonians themselves) def re novelties, and long for a change. Therefore he addressed his Embassadors into Achaa, both to exact an oath of the Achæans for their alleageance (for they had capitulated in the accordand agreement made, yearly to (wearfealty unto Philip) and allo to deliver in o their hands, Orchomenus, Herca, and Triphilia. And when they demanded also Aliphera the Embassadors answered, that the City never pertained to Triphylia, but that of right it ought to be reflored unto Philip: as being one of them which in the generall councill and affembly of the Arcadians, were affigued and fet out for the building of Megalopolis. And thus verily he entercained firm alliance with the A brans As fo the Macedonians hegained their hearts unto him, by occasion of Heraclides: for feeing that by means of him he incurred their exceeding ill will and hard conceit, and that he was N charged with many grievous crimes, he cast him in prilon to gratifie his ownsubjects: whereat the people took great joy and hearts content. Then made he preparation for war, with an earnest endeayor, as at any time before he exercised as well the Macedonians as mercenary fouldiers in pay, namely, to wear their armor and handle their weapons; & in the very prime of fpring, he fent all his forrain aids and light armed touldiers, under the leading of Athenageras into (haonia by the way of Epirus, to leize upon the firaight paffage near to Antigonia, which the Greeks call Stena. Hindelf a few daies after followed with his main army more heavily appointed. And when hehad well viewed & confidered the fituation of the country, and how it lay he judged that the quarter coulting upon the river Assa was the meetelf place to fortifie and encamp in. This river between two hills the one by the pealants of the country called . Eropus the other Afraus, runneth within O a narrow-tale and yieldeth but aimall passage upon the bank fide. He commanded Athenage-The to gain and tortifie Afriam with his light armed fouldiers: him elf encamped upon Eropu. And look what way as the hill was fenced with broken and cragged rocks, there he kept a small

guard of Jome few fouldiers: but whereas there was more danger, and easier accels for the enemy he fortified with tren hes rampiers and bulwarks. He planted also and disposed in convenient places a great number of engins to fend out quarrels and other shot, for to keep the enemies

A aloof. The toyal pavillion of the King himfelf was pitcht before the tampier upon a bank, in a most confriences place of open fight, for to terrifie the enemy, and also to encourage and hearten his own men, when they should see him so consident and resolute. The Consul advertized by Charping the Epirot, what paffages the King with his army was possessed of, after he had passed the winter in Corejra, himself likewise in the beginning of Spring, went up into the main land, and held on his march toward the enemy. And being advanced almost within five miles of the Kings camp he lest his legions in a strong senced place, and went himself in person torward with certain lightly appointed in spiall to discover the quarters, and the morrow after held a consultation, Whether he might do better to affay to pals through the place which the enemy kept (not with flanding he faw evidently before his eyes great trouble and hazard in that adventure) or to bring his B army about and ierch a comp is the lame way, whereas the year before Sulpitius entred into Maecdony. This deliberation held him for certain daies in even balance and suspence, until news came unto him that T. Quanting was created Conful; and having the Province of Macedony allogted unto him made halfe thither and was already paffed to Corcyra.

Valerius Antas writeth how Villius was entred the pals aforelaid & because he could not take the straight and direct way (by reason that the King and his forces had befet all places) followed the traight and direct way (by reason that the saing and the valley along through the middle whereof the river *Aous runneth and having made a bridge the valley along through the middle whereof the river *Aous runneth and having made a bridge *Eas. Plis. the valley along through the initial whereas the King was encamped, and there fought over it, in great hafte paffed over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there fought ovide with a battell: wherein the King was dik omfitted and put to flight, and driven out of his camp: that Pingo Nigo, 1:000 enemies were flain in that conflict, 2200 taken priloners, 132 enfigns won and carried a - verification. way befides 250 horse. Also that during the combat there was a Temple vowed unto Jupiter, in case the Consul speed well in the battell. But all other writers both Greek and Latine, at least wife whose Andals I have read, report that Vidus performed no memorable act, and that the Conful

T. Quinting who next succeeded took in hand the whole and entire war himself.

Whiles things thus puffed in Macedany, the other Conful L. Lengulus who staid behind at Rome, held a general affembly for the election of Centors: And among many famous and noble perfon ges who fired for that dignity, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Elius Parus Were created Cenfors, These two agreeing together in great concord, both e-ected a Senat without defaming any person; and also farmed out the toll for portage deal things that were fold at Copus: Item; they let & to farm let the custome for passage that way whereas the camp stood and where now D there is a town built and enroled three hundred Coloners (for that number was limited by the Senat) there to inhabit. They fold also the lands of Gepualying under the hill Tifuia.

About the fame time L. Manhus Acidinus departed out of Spain, and was prohibited by M. Parcius Lecci à Tribune of the Commons, to enter at his returninto the City with the folemn pomp of an Ovation notwithstanding he had that honour granted by the Senat. So he came into Rome as a private person and brought into the Chamber of the City 1200 pound weight of filver's and thing found weight well-near of gold. The same year Gn. Behins I amphilus, who had received the Province of France from C. Aurelius the Conjul of the former year, engaged himfeli rafhly within the marches of the French Insubrians, and was environed and enclosed round about, both he and in manner his whole army. He lost above 6600 men. See what an overshrow was E received in a war, whereof there was no reckoning made, and from whence no danger was feared shy more. This cauled L. Lentulus the Conful to come our of the City of Rome, who being arrived into a Province full of trouble and tumult, after he had received the charge of afrighted and dification army gate the Practor a great check and rebuke; & took him up roundly with reproachfull terms, yea, and commanded him to get him gone out of the Province, and to repair to Rome. Neither performed the Coniul himself any exploit worthy of remembrance by reason that he was called home to Rome for 10 hold the folering election of Magistrates: which also was staid by M. Falvins and M. Curius Tribunes of the Commons : who likewife would not fuffer T. Quintime Flammings, having been but Quartor, for to fland for a Confulthip. "Now adaies, lay they, the dispities of Ædiles and Prators are nought fet by and not worth the feeking for: and thefe F & noblemen will needs mount into the Confuls place, not by steps and degrees of other offices, wherein they thould make proof and give good testimony what their carriage is, but leaping o-"ver those in the midt, joyned the lowest and highest together. This debate which began in Mars field in the affembly of the people, came at length to be decided before the Senat. And the EE ordained. That for impach as he which fued for that dignity, was by law capable thereof it was realon that the people (hould that e plenary and absolute power to create him, or whomsoever elie they peared. So the Tribunes inbmitted themselves under the authority of the Senator. And for Coff, were elected Sex. Alus Patus, and T. Quinius Flamminus. Then enfued the election of the Pracors. In which were cremed L.Cornelius Merula, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Porcius Cate, and C. Milyan, who had been Ediles of the Commons. By whom the Plebeian plaies were re-G-med; and a tolering feast made in the honour of Jupier; in regard of those plaies. The Curule Edies intering Placens, who also wastne Flamine Dialis or Prieft of Jupiter, and C. Cormiles Comes, exhibited the Roman games with great magnificence. The great Pontifices or Billiops farbing Sulpinas, and L. Gallis died that year : In whose places were enfalled M. o.Emp-Pas Lop day and Con Cornelins Scipia, Now when Sex. Blins Paras and Tiens Quimius Flamininus he Coff, were carred into their Magistracy, they affembled the Senat in the Capitoll : where the

gave order, that concerning the two Provinces of Macedony and Italy, the Confuls should either agree between themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should govern the one or the H other: And that he, whose hap was to have the charge of Macedam, should enroll of Romans three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: Also of Latine allies five thousand footand five hundred horse, for to supply and furnish out the legions. And for the other Consulit was decreed, that he should have an army all entire and new, L. Lentulus the Conful of the former year, continued fill Governour in the Province with express commandment, that neither himfelf thould leave the government, nor withdraw his forces from thence, before the Conful were come with the new legions. So the Confuls referred themselves to the direction of the lots. To Alius tell Italy: and Mazedony to Quintins. As for the Prators, who all were guided by lots. L. Cornelius Merula had the juridiction of the City of Rome, M. Claudius governed Sicily. To M. Porsius was allotted Sardinia, and C. Helvius his lot was to be L. Deputy in Ganl. After this they I began to take musters. For over and besides the Consular armies, the Prators also were charged to levy fouldiers. To Marcellus were affigned four thouland footmen of Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen to go into Sicily. And for Cato three thousand toot of the same kind of souldiers with two hundred horse to serve in Sardinia: upon condition, that when both these Prators were come into their Provinces, they should discharge all the old souldiers there, as well footmen

Then the Confuls granted the Embafiadors of King Attalus leave to come into the Senathouse: where having audience given them, "after they had declared how their King and Master "had affilted the State of Rome with his forces as well by fea as land, and shewed himself chear-"full ready, and obedient to this present day for to execute and perform whatsoever the Roman is "Confuls had enjoyeed him to do; shey aid now, that they much feared left from henceforward " he would not be able to do the same, by reason he was impeached by Antiochus. For Antiochus staking his vantage and finding the realm of Attalus disfurnished of garrifons, and unprovided of forces both by lea and land had invaded the fame. For which occasion Attalus belought the LL of the Senat there affembled, that if they minded to use his navy, and employ the means "that he could make in the service of the Macedonian war, they would then send him a sufficient garriton to defend his kingdom: but if they thought not well thereof, his request was to e permit himielt to return with his fleet and other forces, to the defence of his own. The Senar gave order to return this aniwer unto the Embaliadors: "Whereas King Andus had succoured the Roman Captains with his Armado and other means of war, the Senst accepted thereof in U the best part, But as touching Antiochus the King, anally and friend of the people of Rome, they " neither would fend any aid againft him : nor yet detain the aids of King Attalus in any service of theirs, longer than the King him elf should think it flood with his own commodity. For the manner of the people of Rome hath alwaies beento lerve their own turn with the help and affi-"france of others, but yet at the good pleasure & discretion of others. And who soever were wil-Iling to relieve the Romans, they were at their own liberty to begin and end when they would "themselves, Howbeit they purposed to address their Embassadors unto Antiochusto advertise "him and let him understand that the people of Rome employed the help of Aualus his ships and "fouldiers against Philip, a common enemy: and the Senat would take it kindly at his hands, if "for their fakes he forbare the Realm of Attalus, and abstained from war. For meet and realons "it was, that the Kings who were friends and allies to the people of Rome, fhould like wife enter-" tain peace and amity among themselves.

T. Quinius the Conivi made haste to be gone into his Province: and when he had levied and mustered his souldiers so, as that he had enrolled those old experienced servitors for the most part, who had given good proof of their valour in the service of Spain and Affrick, he was detained so long of Rome by occasion of certain prodigious signs reported, until he had taken order, for the appealing of the gods, and expirtion of them. The lightning scorched and blasted the great port way from Ven: the Common Hall likewise of publike assemblies, and the Temple of Jupiter in Linguium: allo the Temple of Hercites in Arden: the walls belides and turrets of Capua, and the Temple there which is called All a. At Arctium the sky appeared to be on a light fire. N A. Velitra the earth fetied and funk down leaving a great gaping chink for the compais of three acres of ground. Word moreover was brought, that in Sueffa Aurunca a lamb was yeared with two heads and in Sixuella a porket with a mans head. In regard of thele prodigies, there was a proceffion and application one whole day, and the Confuls intended devoutly to their facrifices: and after they had pacified the gods; they took their journey into their Provinces. Elim, together with C. H. louis the Prator went into France and gave unto the faid Prator the army which be received of L. Leztulus, and should have dismissed and discharged of their service; because he purposed himself to employ in his own wars the stell and new legions which he brought with him: but he performed no action worth the report. The other Conful T. Quintim having taken the fea. and departed from Brundusium fooner than other Confuls were wont, arrived at CorograO with eight thouland foot, and eight hundred horse. From thence he croffed the seas with a galleace of five ranks of oars, directing his course for the nearest coasts of Epirm, and by great journeys made haste until he was come to the Roman camp: from whence after he had licensed Villiweto depart, and flaid there some sew daies until his forces which were at Corerrecould overtake him, he called his Councill together to refolve, Whether he should keep on his journey directly, and make way through the midit of his enemies where they lay encamped, or rather without any

In fach attempt (which could not but carry with it great pain and perill) fetch a compais about with facty, and to enter into Macedon; by the way of the Daffaretians country and Lingua. And verilysthis latter courte of the twain had taken place, but that he feared, when he were retired once far from the fea, and had let the enemy flip out of his hands, if the King haply were minded as he haddone before) to detend himfelf within the defarts and forreits, that he, should frend all the long summer and do no good. Therefore come what would of it, he refolved to affail the enemy in that very place as difficult as it was, with all the difadvantage what foever. But as they determined in their intention thus to do, so they were not so ready in the means to execute and effect the fame. Thus they fate fill and ipent toty dates within the eye of the enemy, and made no attempt. Then Philip conceived some hope to affay a peace, by the means and intercession of the Epitot

Inter Print Concerved tome nope to altay a peace, by the means and interceffion of the Epirot B nation. And after conductation had there were creatian agents choicn for that purpose to wit. Pausfauist the Practor, and Alexander Generall of the hone; who brought the Consili and the King together for to parl, into a place whereas the fiver Alous is natrowess, and the banks nearest together. The demands of the Consili in sum were theire: That Philip should remove his garrison our of the Cities Item. That whole territories or towns he had pilled and spoiled, he should make restitution again unto them all those things that were extant and to be found: as fortherest, they should be prized and valued indifferently to their worth. Philip made answer again, "That all "those peeces were not of like quality and condition. As for such as he had taken himself, he "would be content to set them at liberty: but for those that were lest unto him by his progenitors and predecessors, he would not lorgo the possession thereof sciences he del them lawfully in right of inheritance, Finally, it hose Cities wherewith he had warred made complaint, that they were ever endamed by him, he would report himselfs on the Cities and Predecession.

The morrow after there passed many light skirmines between the corp is quard on both parts by way of excursions, first in a plain that lay out broad enough for that purpose: but afterwards as the Kings men retired themselves into the nartow (raights and rough sugged places, the Romans of an a dent defice to be sighting, entred thintersoon after. The Romans had on their side the benefit of good order and military discipline and were furnished with such kind of weapons as were fit for to maintain a ski.mish in a set battle. Things this flanding in these terms, there happed a certain herdman sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirors to be brought before the Coniul: who gave him to understand that he kept cattell a grazing in that forrett (whi h then was overspread with the Kings pavillion) and knew all the fanks, all the windings, turnings, and blind waies of those mountains; promising, that if he would fend out a band of fouldiers with him, he would conduct them thorow a place that was neither dengeroos nor yet difficult and hard of afcent : which if they had once gained, they flould beover their enemies heads and able to command them. And these things (quoth he) you may farely treat upon: for Charopia willed me to make declaration, That he could wish you the Conful were Matter of all rather than any other. The Conful was defirous to believe all, but durit nex credit him. And thus being troubled in spirit, whiles he entertained in his heart both joy and fear together, at length the authority of Charopse induced him to resolve and give the adventure of this hope this offered and prefented unto him. And to the end that the enemy might different and imperentating, for two dates following he never cealed to affail and provoke him, fewing companies of armed fouldiers in every place, to charge upon him, and ever feconding them with fresh mente lucceed in the place of the wearied. After this, he delivered to a Tribune or Coloniell fourthousind chosenfootmen, and three hundred horsemen: with this direction, to lead forward the Cavalry, as far as the ground would give leave : and when they were come Gong to Fplace whete the horfemen could not pals not march farther, then to plant them in fone plant and even ground: willing the footmen to march on as the guide should lead them, and point out their way but after they were mounted above the enemies heads, according as he underrook and made promise, then to give a fign by smok, and not to shout and to set up a cry until one might gueffe that upon figuall of barrell by him given, the battell was begun. And the Conful. gave conting adments to march by night (for as good hap was, the Moon was at full, and shone albuigholoug) and take their refection and fleep in the day time. As for the guide aforefaid, he made unto him many fair and large promifes if it might appear, that he meant truth, and dealt !! Sithfully: howbeit in the mean time he delivered him bound to the custody of the faid Colonel. When these companies were thus sent away, the Roman Generall travelled and endeavoured so much the more to gain vantage of the enemies guards. All this while, the Romans that were fent out with the Colonel; marched forward; and upon the third day, when they had given token by imoak, that they had won the pitch of the hill as they intended, and held it still: then the Control divided his forces into three squadrons, and entred the midst of the valley with the main strength of his army, but he led forth the wings of his battell, both the right and the left, against the very camp of the enemies. Who also for their parts were not behind to re-encounter and receive him And all the whiles that they advanced without their fortifications of defence upon a hot defire of conflict, it fell out, that the Roman fouldier had the better a good deal, as being more valourous. I more skilful, and better appointed with weapons for that kind of service. But after that the Kings fouldiers, whe cofmany were wounded or killed outright, retired themselves to places of fasery. either by natural fituation or by art of man the danger returned upon the Romans heads, who inconsideratly were engaged into places of diladvantage, and into narrow streights, from whence they could no retire with eree, And furely they had not returned back again unpunished for their rashness but that the Kings men hearing first an outcry behind their backs, and seeing also a skirmish begun, were assonied at the sudden terror, and pur besides themselves. Some fled here and there away; others that made a fland and tarried flill, for that they rather wanted ground to flie than had heart enough to fight it out, were environed by their enemies both before and behind The whole army might have been utterly defeated, if the winners had luftily followed the chafe, K But the straights and the roughness of the waies hindred the horse, and the weight of armor combred the footmen. At first the King rode amain with bridle in horse neck without regard of any thing or looking behind him : but after he was got five miles before & gueffing (as it was indeed) that by reason of the disadvantage of the place the enemy could not possible make way after the refled upon a certain mount and fent his people all abroad over hils and dales, to rally his fouldiers together that were dispersed. Thus with the loss not all our of two thousand men the rest of the multitude met together, as if they had repaired to a Rendezvanz upon some fignal given & somarched with a great train into Theff. ly. The Romans purfued them as far as they might with fafety. killing them, and rifling the dead; yea and raplacked the Kings camp which though it were naked without defendants, yet for the difficult access unto it, they had much trouble to win & that night L they lodged in their own camp. The next day the Conful made pursuit after the enemy along the firaight, whereas the river runneth amoung the vallies. The K came the first day unto the hold or camp of Pyrhu(a place to called Jin Triphilia, belonging to the territory of Melotis From whence the morrow after he markhed a mighty journey with his whole army (for needs he must go that fear drives)& approached the mountain Lingor. These mountains are in Epirus, fituate between Macdony and The fall, The fide that lieth to The fall regardeth the East: that which butteth upon Macdony hath the North directly before it. Covered they are and overspred with abundance of woods; yet so as the very tops do affoard open plains and running waters. The King keeping his camp there for certain dates, was much troubled and perplexed in his mind, casting and tevolving, whether it were expedient for him to return immediatly into his own kingdom, or possible w to retire himself into Theffuly. Insum, his resolution was to bring down his army into Theffuly. And so to Tricea he marched the next way he possibly could From thence he passed in great haste through all the Cities that were in his way. As many men as were able to follow, he forced to quit their habitations and dwelling houses. The towns he set on fire : yet he permitted every one to carry away with him as much as he could of his own goods; all the reft fell to the fouldiers thate. No manner of cruelty there was, that the very enemy could exercise, but he practised among his own allies, And Philip him elf in the execution thereof, grieved not a little, and was vexed at the heart; but also he could do no other; yet his defire was, in that country which within a while should be possessed by the enemy to save the bodies at least wife of his associats. In this manner were ranfacked & spoiled these towns fol owing, Phacium, Irefia, Eubydrium, Eretria, & Palaphatus. Against his coming to Phera the gates were shut upon him. And because it would ask some time to win that town by a sault, and no leifure he had thereto, he gave over that enterprile, & passed into Man, cedons: for the bruit went that the Etolians also approached. Who having heard of the issue of the battell fought by the river Aous, first wasted and ransacked all the country near unto Sperchia and Marra Come (as they call it) and having from thence passed overinto Thessal, won Cyo mines and Angeas with the first affault. Howbeit, a repulse they took at Metropolis, whiles they harried the fields about it by reason, that the townsmen ran together to the desence of their wals, After this they gave the attempt upon Callithera, where they found the like resistance and violence of the enemies: but there they perfifted longer, and gave not over, nay, they drave the enemies that issued forth within their walls, and contenting themselves with that sictory, they departed then e seeing no great hope to force the town. Then they won and pilled two villages, Then the maand, alathana, As ict Acharra, it was surrendred by composition. And upon the like seas Xynie also was abandoned of her own inhabitants. These Citizens thus driven out of their own houses, flumbled at a venture upon a garrison which was a leading into Athamania, for the beto tergnard of the forragers that were to purvey corn. This multitude, I fay, marching difordering without armour, pell mell together, with a fort that were unmeet for war, was hewnin pecces

by the armed fouldiers, and Xyric was facked, thus left and forfaken as it was. After this, the According lians won Cyphara, a fort and town of strength, well leated for to empeach and command * Dolo- * exoblethe pia. These exploits performed the Etolians haftily, all in sew daies.

Neitherrefied Aminander nor the Athamans quiet and fill, after they heard the news of the prosperous battell which the Romans had tought, But Aminander reposing small trust in his own fouldiers craved of the Contul a small supply of other forces: and as he marched toward Gomphis he jurprized forthwith and forced a town named Pheca, fittlat between Gomphe and the flrajehts that divide Theff. ly from Athamania. From thence he advanced before Gomphi, and affailed the town which was detended right valiantly for certain daies : but after that he had erected icaling ladders against it, he forced the townimen within, for very fear to yield and render all into his B hands. The furrender of this City terrified the Theffalians exceedingly: in fuch fort, that the Citizens of Argenta Pherinam, Thima um, Lifinas Stimon, and Lampfum, one after another fubmitted themselves, with other peeces thereby of imall importance. Whiles the Athamanians and Ætolians (fecured from ail danger of the Macedonians) made spoil and railed again to themselves by the victory of others: whiles Theffaly was pilled and facked by three armies at once, and knew not their friends from their foes, nor whom to truft the Conful passed over into the country of 'Epirus by the way of the straights which he had opened # Albania and madeclear by reason that the enemies were fled. And albeit he knew full well which way all the Epirots in general went, and with whom they had fided, excepting only Prince Charopus yet because he law them not only careful to make amends and satisfaction, but also willing and C forward to do whatfoe er he commanded he effeemed and regarded them by their prefer flate. more than by their demeanor part, and so by shewing himself inclined to mercy and easie to pardon a fault, he won their hearts and gained them unto him for the time to come. After this he dispatched messengers to Corcrea, to will that the kulks and Thips of burden should put into the gulph of * Amtracia whites himler travelled by easie journies; and the fourth day after pitched. * Golfodel * his tents upon the hill * Cercetius: and thither he sent for Aminander to repair with his aids, not: * Strabe Sinhs. for any need he had of his forces, so as much as of his guidance to direct him in his journeys for it is a part of Theffaly, Most of the Epirotsalso, for the same intent were received, who voluntarily offered the mountain their helpand affitance. But the affault & battery continuing uncessantly both night and day, overcame at length the constant and resolute valour of the Macedonians, For the Conful made this te koning I has upon this point depended the hearts and dispositions of all the other Thessalians, if the first should not be able to abide the violence and force of the Romans. Muchabout the same time that the Conful first encamped against Philip in the straights of Epirus, L. Quintine also, the Conful his brother who by commission from the Senat had the charge of the fleet and the government of till fea-coaffs; failed beyond Corcyra with two Galleaces of five banks of oars and hearing that the navy was departed from thence, leeing also there was no staying there he mide fail after apace, and having overtaken them at the Isle Zamma he dismissed Apuffing in whole place he forceeded: from thence he went fair & foftly haling after him the mok part of the flips which followed with the provision of victuals, until he came to Malea. There Bests joyning together about the Island Andres, croffed the narrow fear from thence to Edbers And first they forraged the territory of the Carystians: afterwards feeing Corifins from enough against them by reason of agarrison sent to them in all haste from Chalcin, the approached to Brories. L. Quintus having intelligence that King Artalus was come, repaired thither also with those vessels which had been at Pyreeum, & gave commandment, that as many ships as arriwed thither belonging to his fleet, should bend their course for Eubea. Now was Eretria by all forcible means affaulted, for not only the vessels of three joynt navies had brought thisher all forts of engins and artillery deviled for to shake and batter the walls of Cities, but also the fields and country hard by, yielded them plenty of timber, and other matter to make new. The townsmen from the very first day shewed no valour and courage in defending their walls: and afterwards when they were wearied, and some of them hurt, and saw withall a part of their wall overshrown by the ordnance and engins of the enemy, enclined to yield: but they had amongst them a garrison of Macedonians, whom they feared no less than the Romans. Moreover, Philades a Captain under the King fent messengers unto them from Chalcis, assuring them, that if they could hold out fill and endure the fiege, he would in good time be with them, and bring relief. Thus hope and fear together conftrained them to drive offlonger than either they were willing or well able to do. But when they heard once that Philocles had a repulse by the way, and in great halfe and fear was retired and fied to Chalcis again, then immediatly they tent their Embaffadors unto Attalus, to crave pardon and protection. Whiles they were wholly bent to feek peace (whereof they had some hope) and foreslacked the affairs of war-fervice, opposing their corps de guard on that fide only of the wall where the breaches were, and neglecting all befides, behold, Quizting in the R night-leason gave a camillado in that quarter which was least suspected, and with scaling ladders won the town. The whole multitude of the inhabitants fled with their wives and children into the Castle, which also afterwards was rendred up. As for money, gold, and filver, there was no great flore to speak of but Images, and painted tables of antique work, artificially wrought, and such like ornaments, there were more found, than for the proportion of the bigness, or other wealth besides, of such a City as that was. From thence they set fail once again for Caryllus, where the whole multitude, before the enemies were put on land, having abandoned the City, were fled into their fortrels: from whence they fent their Orators unto the Roman Generall, humbly craving their mercifull protection. The townsmen presently had their lives and libertie granted them. But the Macedonians were put to their raniom and they compounded to pay * three hundred fil-L engl fh,reckover lefterces apeece, and to give up their armour and weapons, and so to depart: With this sum of money having redeemed themselves they were set out disarmed into Bastia. These forces at sea Rerce (which having in few daies gained two poble and renowned Cities in Eubea, coasted about Sunium, a and a half) at promontory of cape within the territory of Actica, and arrived before Cenchrea, a town of mera d.tarthing. chandile and traffick belonging to the Corinthians,

The Conful all this while had a longer and more dangerous piece of service in the siege (of Rhapes) than all men looked for. And the chemies within made relistance, where he would have leaft of all superfied. For he supposed verily that all the trouble and difficulty would be in battering down the wall, & making some breach. For thus he thought that if he had once opened way for his armed fouldiers to enter into the town, the enemies afterwards would either flee or bear flain as it falleth out commonly in Cities when they are forced. How beit, when part of the wall by the battery of the Ram lay flat along, and the enemies were got over at the breaches & ruins thereof; then began their labour and pains anew, as if they had had no trouble nor toil afore. For the Macedonians in garrison, who were many in number, and those approved and select souldiers, thinking how honourable a lervice it would be to defend the City by valour and dint of fword. rather than by the firength of walls had ranged themselves in a battell within fronglymarshalled into many ranks and files ciose together and when they perceived the Romans were mounting over the breaches to enter the City, they repelled and beat them back in that place of great disadvantage, where they had much ado to recover and retire themselves. The Col, hereat was much difpleased; and vexed in him'elf: and making this account, that such a foul foil and disgrace was not of only an occasion of a longer track of time, before he could force that one City; but also material and important for the main progress and proceeding of the whole war, which commonly dependeth upon the occurrences of light matters and of small moment in the beginning: after be had rid and cleanled the place which was choaked up with the ruins of the half-broken wall lying there upon heaps he reared a tower or frame of timber of a huge height to overtop the walls, confifting of many flories and floors one over another, which contained and carried a mighty number of armedmen, and drave the fame upon wheels and rollers close to the wall. Moreover he sent out certain ensigns, one after another by turns, to break through by force (if it were possible) that firong and close battailon of the Macedonians (which they themselves call Phalana.) But the place being so streight (for that the breach of the wall was nothing broad) o the enemies had the vantage both in regard of the weapons which they used, and of the form of battell wherein they were ranged. For when the Macedonians standing close one to another with a continued roof or fence of targets over their heads, opposed their pikes before them which were of an exceeding length: the Romans neither with their darts could hurt them afge off, nor with their swords drawn come near them to fight close at hand, or cut their pikes in two: and if it chanced that they whipt off or inapt any alunder, yet the feel and truncheon

A thereof being that p fill at the point (headless though it were,) among the other pikes that were headed. lerved to make a sence as it were an hay or pallaisade. Over and besides that part of the wal that flood whole and found fill, was a fure defence unto both flanks of the enemies: peither had the Romans any room at length to return, and from thence to feeth their beir, and so give a violent charge, which is the thing that usually breaketh and disordereth ranks. Moreover, there chanced one thing by meer fortune that encouraged them within: for as the tower aforesaid was in driving over a terrais or bank whereof the floor was not fast and soundly hardned with the rammer, one of the wheels hapned to fink in and make a deep rout in the ground, whereby the whole frame nodded fo forward that the enemies without thought verily it was ready to fall, and the armed fouldiers standing upon it within quaked for fear, and were put well-near besides their wits. B Thus when nothing that was provided might avail and come to any great effect, the Conful was vexed at the heart, to fee himself so over-matched in souldiers, in armour, and in manner of fervice; and withall he confidered, that he had no help to force the City and to win it in any short time, nor could make means to pass the winter in those parts so far from sea, and left paked already and waste by those calamities that follow wars. Whereupon he raised the siege: and because there was no haven in all the tract and coatt of Acarnania and Ætolia. which was able both to receive and harbour all his hulks that brought victuals for his army, and also to yield winter lodging for his legions; he thought upon the Isle Anticyra within the country of Phocis; which lying toward the gulph of Corinch, feemed to him most fit and commodious for his purpose; because they should not remove far from Thessay, and the territories belonging to the enemies ha-C ving besides Peloponnesus aftront even over against them, divided but by a small arm of the sea : as their back Atolia and Acarnania: and of each fide Locris and Bavia. At the first assault, the Conful without any reliftance won Panopea in Phocis; Anticyra likewise long endured not the fiege. Then Ambrifus and Hyampolis were received by composition. Daulis by reason that it was fituate upon an high hill could neither be scaled nor forced by instruments and engins of battery.

But the Romans by lancing their darts and shooting arrows against them that were in guard. trained them forth to skirmish; and after some light scufflings to no effect, whiles one while they seemed to flie, and other whiles to pursue, they brought them to be so careless, so negigent and so little respective, that when the enemies fled back within the gate, they entred pell-mell with them, and so were Masters of the town. Other small forts likewise of Phoca yielded rather D for fear than any force offered unto them, Elasia kept their gases shur, and made a countenance, that unless they were driven thereunto, they would receive within their walls neither Roman captain nor army.

Whiles the Conful lay at the fiege before Elasta, there was prefented unto him the hope of a greater matter, namely, of withdrawing the nation of the Aches from the Kings alliance to the amity of the Romans, For they had expelled and banished Cycliadas the chief of that faction the fided with Philip: and Arifthenus who triended the Romans and fought to be confedered with them, was Prætor for the time.

Now the Roman Armado, together with Attalus and the Rhodians, rode at anchor in the haven of Cenchrea, and they all were agreed in common to affail Gorineh. But the Conful trioughe E good, before that they should put that designment in action, to send Embassadors to the State of Achaia, promising, if they would revold from the King and turn to them, to deliver, Corinth into their hands, for to be incorporate into the ancient league and councill of their nation. And so by the advice of the Conful, there were Embafiadors addressed to the Achæans from his brother La Quintius, from Attalus, the Rhodians and the Athenians. And at * Sieyone was there & Councill * Bafilles and Diet held for to give them audience. Now the Achaens were not all of one mind and alike affected. The Athenians (a dangerous, an ordinary, and continual enemy of theirs) put them in fear of one fide: the Romans they had in dread and horrour of another. To the Macedonians they were obliged and bound by many good turns and favours, as well old as new. The K, himfelf they held in jealousie for his cruelty and treachery: and casting a proof and conjecture by those F courses which he then took and by his practices for the time, they foresaw well, that after the war ended he would be intollerable and a very tyrant over them. They were besides not only ignorant, what every man had faid in the feverall councels of every particular State, and in the general Diets of the whole nation, when they were required to deliver their opinions; but also uncertain and unresolute among themselves in their own minds what to will or wish. Unto men thus doubtfully disposed and unserted, the Embassadors abovesaid were admitted, and license was given them to deliver their mestage. First, the Roman Embassador L. Calphurnins : after him, those that were for King Attalus: and in the third place, the Rhodians spake and made discourse: and consequently, the Embassadors of Philip were permitted to parl, The Athenians had audience given them last of all, and were reserved of purpose to confute whatsoever should be spoken G and alledged by the Macedonians. And these Athenians inveighed most sharply and bitterly against the King, for none had received either more wrongs, or suffered the like indignities at his hands as they had. So this affembly verily for that time(by reason that the day was spent in hearing the continued orations of so many Embassadors) brake up about sun setting. The morrow aster they affembled again: where the Magistrates by the voice of the Beadle or publike crier (after the custome of the Greeks.) gave liberty to every person to deliver his mind, and no man frepped forth. Great filence there was, and not a word among them for a long time, looking

At length, because the Councill should not be dissolved without some speech and parl, Arifthenus the Prætor of the Achæans began to speak, and said: "What is be-"come (my Masters of Achas) of those hearts of yours and couragious stomacks, whereby at all of your fealts and in your private meetings (when talk is ministred of Philip and the Romans) you can hardly hold your hands, but are ready to fly one in anothers face? But now arthis day the Romans baving finished the "Carthaginian war, which for fixteen years space they supported in the very heart and bowels of " Haly, have not fent a garrison to succour and maintain the Ætolians in their wars, but are come themselves, as leaders and commanders General, and by Land and Sea at once have warred up-C" on Macedony. And this is the third Conful of theirs, who at this prefent maintaineth mortal "war upon it, to the uttermost of his power. Sulpriss hath encountred the King in the mids? of Macedons, bidden him battel, discomfitted and put him to flight, after he had laid wast and defolar the wealthieft quarter of all his Kingdom. Quintim lately hath driven him out of camp "and field, not withflanding he were possessed of the streight avenues of Epirus, and bare himself boldly and confidently upon the natural fituation of the grounds of his strong defences, and force " of acomplete army: and having purfued him as he fled into Theffaty, hathcaken the garrison "Towns of the King, and in manner within his own fight, won by mere torce his confederate Ci-"ties. Suppole and lay, that all those things which the Athenians erewhile have alledged con-"cerning the cruelty, the avarice, and unbridled lust of the King, be not true, but supposed slan-D "ders; admit that those enormities and wicked parts committed within the Attick land, against "the Gods of Heaven above, of the infernal ipirits beneath, touch not us at all, and are much lefs "pertinent; than those outrages which the Eleuntii and the Abydens, so far remote from us, have "endured. Forget we our selves, if ye will, the hurts, the wounds, and losses that we have recei-"ved, the murders the pilling and rifling of the goods of Messens in the midth of * Peloponnesses. * Monte. "Likewi@,how his friend and hoft Garitenes at Cyparifia, was killed against all Law of God and ann, even in a manner fitting at the board with meat in his mouth. Say we nothing also of "Attalus the father and ion, both Sicyonians, who were cruelly maffacred, and yet he was wont to "call the filly and wretched old man, Father. Also sorbear we to speak of the lons wife, who was "Carried away into Macedony, to make her his harlot and concubine, and to abuse her at his plea-E "fore, Let other rapes of virgins, forcings of honorable dames be forgotten: let us imagine that "we have nothing to do, nor to meddle with Philip for fear of whole cruelty ye were all fo mute, and could not open your mouth. For what other cause of silence had ye, being called hither to this counsel? Let us put the cale, that we were to debate the matter with Antigonus, that most "mild and just Prince, at whose gracious hands we have received so many favours and pleasures "above all other Kings: would he demand, think ye, that we should do that which possibly then could not be done? Pelopannefus is a demy Island, joined to the firm continent and main land, by the narrow freight or bank of I fthmus, lying open and exposed to nothing more than to Seaforces. If one hundred covert and decked fhips with harches, and fifty lighter veilels which are open, rogether with thirty Brigantins or fours of Iff & should come to pill and spoil our sea coasts, F "and begin to afful our Towns and Cities that lie open upon the River, even on the very strand "and Seabanks; should we retire our selves, think ye, into our Cities within the Land? Why? what elle? As though we were not already afficted and plagued with intestine war, which sicketh even within our ribs and bowels? When Nabis and the Lacedemonians by land, the Ro-"man navy by Sea shall lie upon us, to do us all annoy, how should I call upon the Kings society, "or for the help of the Macedonians? Or shall we of our selves, by our own strength and means " fave our Cities which shall be affaulted against the puilfance and power of the Romans? For in the former war we bravely defended (did we not?) the City of Dyms. We have examples "mongh of the fearful calamities and loffes of others, that we need not to make our felves examples unto others. Take heed (I befeech you) how you feel light and diddin, that the Romans have G of their own motive offered their friendship and alliance, which indeed ye were to with for, "and feek all that ever ye could. It is for very fear (no doubt) that they are driven, being in a of the service and that ever ye could. It is for very least and doubt, the service service of the service of th der the shadow of your wings, be harboured within your havens, and sustained by your victual and provision, No, no, Lords they are first of the seas, who can deny it? there is not a land they (set foot into, but immediatly it is their own, and in subjection unto them what sever they feem to request, they can command if they lift, And because they are willing to spare and forbear you,

" therefore it is that they fuffer you not to enter into any action that might be cause of your ruin H "and overthrow, For whereas Cleomedon erewhile feemed to shew and lay before you a mean and "indifferent courle; and that forfooth, which should be the safest way that you could take, name-"Iv-to enter into no arms at all, to fit stil and sleep in awhole skin; that, I say, is no middle way, no, "nor (to speak truth) any way at all. For besides this that ye must either accept or refuse the alli-"ance with the Romans, what else wil become of us, but to be a prey unto the conqueror, having "loft the grace and favour both of the one and the other? as men that like neuters, expecting the "iffue of the war, frame our defignments and counsels to the blind direction of fortune, Wel, once "again I fay, take heed you think not from of that which with all your heart you should wish & " pray for, only for that it is tendered and presented unto you. And never think, that because to "day you have the choise of both in your own hands, therefore ye shall ever have the same liber- I "ty hereafter, Occasions & opportunities are not alwaies the same, neither do they continue long. "All this whiles have ye had a defire to fave and free your felves from Philip, but evermore by "wishes & praiers in secret heart, rather than by taking arms in open hand. Now there are those "which with great armies & armadoes have passed the seas, who without your pain and peril are "ready to deliver you from his hands. These men, if ye reject and refule for your allies, ye are not "well in your wits, & have them you must either your allies or your enemies, there is no remedy. After this Oration of the Pretor, there arole a muttering and noise in the affembly, whiles some

approved and gave affent unto that which he faid, others rebuked in churlish wise those that accorded. Infomuch, as they jangled not one with another in particular, but the very States there assembled were at variance, yea, and this debate between the Magistrates of the whole nation k (whom they call Demiurgi, and ten they are in number) was as hotly maintained, as among the multitude. Five of them faid, they would propound unto the people, and debate with them in counted about accepting the alliance of the people of Rome, and put it to voices. The other five protefted, that this was directly against a law, in that case provided, forbidding expresly that no Magillrats should either propound or determine ought in any Diet, prejudicial to the society and league with Philip. Thus was this day also spent in debating and wrangling, and nothing done, There remained one day yet of a tull Diet and Councel, for by law they were to conclude and decree somewhat within three dayes at the farthest. Against that time, the parties were so hotly bent one against the other, that the fathers could hardly forbear to offer violence to their very children. There was one Rhiftafas of Peller a. who had a fon named Memnon, and he was a Demi-I urgus, who took part and fided with them that would not permit the matter to be put to quefion, and determined by a scrutiny of voices. This Rhisiasus having instantly a long time importuned his fon, and belought him to fuffer the Acheans to provide for their weal publick, and not by his peevish ftowardnes undo the state of the whole nation: when he saw once that all his prayers prevailed nothing, he fware a great oath that he would kill him with his own hands, and not take him for his lon, but for an errant enemy. By which his menaces, he gained thus much in the end, that content he was the next day to joyn with them that put the matter to question: who now being more in number than the other made a report and proposed the cause to the affembly: and when all the States in manner there met enclined thereto, and approved thereof, so as they avowed openly what they would ordain; the Dymzans, Megapolitans, and certain Argives, before M the decree was enacted, rose up all at once, and departed out of the assembly, and no man either wondred at it, or blamed them for ir. As for the Megapolitans, no longer ago than in their grandfires dayes, at what time as they were expelled out of their country by the Lacedemonians, K. Antigorus had restored them again. The Dymeans being but lately taken prisoners, and ransacked by the Roman army, Philip having given order that they should be redeemed wheresoever they were in flavery and bondage, he not only fet free, but also replanted in their own country. The Argives last of all, besides that they are of a settled opinion and belief that the Macedonian Kings are descended from them, were for the most part linked unto Philip in the right and regard of privat hospitality, and familiar friendship. In these respects, they went out of that assembly which inclined to the contract of alliance with the Romans, and were held excused for this departure; being thus N obliged unto Philip the adverse part, by great favours and benefits, yea, and those newly received at his hands. All the other States of the Achaans, when they were demanded their opinions, without delay confirmed by their immediat decree, the society with Attalus and the Rhodians: but the league with the people of Rome, because it could not be ratified and established without the Act of the people, was referred and put off until the time that Embafladors might be fent unto Rome. But for the present it was thought good that three Embassadors should be addressed unto L. Quintius, and that all the forces of the Acharans should march toward Corinth, for that Quintius having won the port of Cenchrea, was already at the fiege and affault of that City.

Theie Acheans encamped themselves over against that gate that openeth toward Siezone: the Romans lay against that part of the City which looketh toward Cenchrea and Attalash aving led O his army through the narrow streight of Ishmus, assailed them of Lechaus side, which is an haven of the other Sea. At the first they made no not assault, hoping that there would be some mutiny between the Towns-men and the Kings garrison. But perceiving they were all of one mind and resolution, and that both the Macedonians defended the City, as their own native country and also the Corinthians were content to be at the full command and direction of Androsshens the Captain of the garrison, as well as if he had been their sellow-citizen, and lawfully chosen by a dreir own decition and fuffrages: then the affailants had no other hopebut in the violent force men own executions and of all fides they had raifed banks and mures, and were come close to the walls, although with hard accels thereto. Now had the Ram from that quarter where the Romans lay, bearen down a good part of the wall. To which breach, because it lay maked without defence, all the Macedonians ran to guard and defend it by frength of arms: where there was a cruel fight between them and the Romans. At the first the Romans were foon repulsed by means of the great numbers of defendants: but after the fuccours of the Achai and Arralus came unto them, they received them with equal valour: neither doubted they but to be able with eafe to drive the Macedonians and the Greeks from their Handings, and force them to retreat. But there were within the Town a multitude of Italian fugitives revolved and fled from the Romans : pare R of them, a refidue left of Annibal his army; who having trangreffed the laws, for fear of punishment were fled from the Romans, and took part with Philip: part also were marriners and seafaring men, who for hope of more honorable intertainment and fervice, had abandoned their ships, and were gotten into the City of Covinth. These fellows past all hope of life, if the Romans haply should have the better hand fared more like mad men than hardy and audacious souldiers. Now there is over-against Sieyone a promontory of Inno, which they call the Cape of Acree, and it runneth into the Sea: from whence the passage over to Corinth is a cut almost of seven miles. This ther Philocles, a Captain also under King Philip, had conducted through Bastia 1 500 souldiers: and certain Brigantins of Corinth were there ready to embark that supply of aid, and to transport them to Lechaus. By this time Attalus advised to set on fire the engine and fabricks that they had C mide, and presently to give over the siege. Quintius persisted yet more obstinatly in his enterprise begun. But he also seeing the Kings guards ranged and quartered at every gate, and that if they should hap to fally out, their violence would hardly be suffrained, was of the same mind with Ar-

talus. So without effecting any thing, the Achaens were dismissed, and the rest returned to their thips, Attelus to Pira um, the Romans to Coregra, During this service by Sea forces, the (other) Consul who lay in camp before Elasta in Phocis, first assisted to gain the City by conference and parly with the principal citizens thereof: but after aniwer made, that it lay not in their hands, and that they who were for the King, outwent the Towns-men both in number and firength: then at once from all parts he gave an affault unto the City both by force of arms, and also by engins of artillery. The Ram was bent against the walls, D and as much thereof beaten down with a mighty crash and fearful noise as stood between the Towers: whereupon the Town was diffmantelled and laid naked, and withal a cohort of Roman fouldiers entred at the open breach; so as from all parts the desendants abandoned their guards, and ran to that place that thus was diffrested by the enemies. And at one instant the Romans advanced themselves over the breach, and set up scaling ladders against the wall which was standing, and whiles the enemies were amused wholly, and had their eye only upon that one place where the conflict was, the wall in many parts was scaled, and armed souldiers mounted into the City, At which inddain tumu-t and alarm, the armed men having quit the place which they guarded with a thick troop fled all into the castle for sear; and the united and naked multitude followed after. Thus the Conful was mafter of the City: which being ranfacked, he fent unto the Caffle E certain messengers, promising life to as many of the Kings garrison as would depart away without arms, and offering liberty to the Elatians: and after fecurity given hereof, within few dayes the Cattle allo was rendred into his hands. Moreover, by the arrival of Philodes (a commander for the King) in Aches, not Corinth only was delivered from fiege, but the City also of the Argives, was by certain of the principal rulers betrayed unto Philotels, who before had founded and follicited the minds and affections of the common people. There was a custome inthis City that upon the fift day of their general affemblies, the Pretor should in token of good luck pronounce the names of Jupter, Apple, and Hercules: and afterwards ordained it was besides by a law, that the name of Philop should make up the fourth. Now after the alliance accorded between them and the Romans it happened that the beadle or publick cryet left out the name of Philip: whereat the mulpitude fift began to muttet and grumble: then arofe a loud cry of those that put him in mind to name the King, willing him to give him his honor due by law; until a laft his name was also pronounced with great applause and consent. Upon the considerace and assurance of this favour Philoceles was fent for, who he winks failed upon a third.

nounced with great applaule and consent. Upon the confidence and assurance of this tayour Philocles was sent for, who by might seised upon an hill that commanders the City, which commonly is called the fort of Las flat and having put a garrison thereaste next morning bettimes he advanided forward with banner displaid, and came down toward the common place lying under the forties aforefaid: where there encountred him a band of armed men well appointed in order of bittail. These were the girtison of the Achael lately there placed, to the number of 500 elect men chosen forth of all the States, of Achael and one Encessance a Dynam was their commander, C swade and exhort him to quit the City; giving him to understand, That he and his Company were not able to match the Town-men alone, who could the force might be the Mandaline.

were not able to match the Town-men alone, who caried the fame mind that the Macedonians had done; mitch left then fhould they fland out when the Macedonians were joined unto them; if Macedonians (I'ay) whom the very Romans themselves could not inflain at Corinth. At fifth edd no good either with leader or fouldier: yea, and when within a while they beheld the Afgives also marching armed against them with a great troop from another part, and saw prefent death before their eyes, yet it seemed they would have put it to the hazard of a conflict, and fought to the last man, in case their Captain would have stuck to it, and not relented. But the Einsidemustor fear left together with the City, the flour of all the youth of Achea flould perift, eapirollated with Philocles, that they might be pelmitted to depart and go their way: but himself kept his ground fill in his armour, with some few of his followers and vaffals, and removed not a foot. Then Philotles fent out unto him, to demand, What he meant thereby? Unto whom he gave no other words, but holding forth his shield before him made answer, That armed as he was he would live and die in the guard and defence of that City which was committed to his charge. Then by the commandment of the Captains, the Thracians lanced their darts and shot at him, and so both he and the company about him were slain every one. Thus after the accord of alliance between the Achaans and Romans, two most noble and famous Cities (Argiand Co. rinth) came under the subjection of the King. These were the acts atchieved by the Romans as well by Land as Sea this fummer.

In France there was no exploit performed worth remembrance by Sext. Elius the Conful notwithstanding he had under his government two entire armies: the one that he retained still with him, which by order he should have discharged, and was the same that had before been commanded by L. Cornelius the Pro-conful and now by him was committed to the charge of C. Elius: the other, that he brought himself with him into the Province. So that he imployed the whole year almost in compelling the men of Cremona and Placentia to return into their Colonies, from whence by fundry cafualties of war they were chafed and dispersed. As France that year was in quiet beyond all hope and expectation, fo about the City of Rome there had like to have been a commotion and tumult of bondflaves. The Carthaginian hoftages were in guard and kept at K Setia, where they had attending about them (as meet was for the children of the chief Nobles and Princes of Carthage) a mighty train and retinue of servants. The number of them was the greater by occasion of the late Affrican war; during which time and presently after, the Setinsalso themselves had bought up many of that nation which were taken captives, and came in port-s le with the rest of the prizes. These having conspired together, sent out certain of their own company to follicite allo the other flaves that were in the territory of Setia, and so forth, as many as they could find about Norba and Circeii. Their plot was, that when all things were provided aforehand, they should upon the very day of the solemn games and plaies (which shortly were to be exhibited and let forth in Setia) take the opportunity of the time, when as the people were bufy in beholding the spectacle and shew represented unto their eye, and to run upon them: and L when they had by maffacre in this fuddain hurlyburly possessed themselves of Seria, thentogo forward and surprise Norba and Circeii. This horrible complot and conspiracy was detected, and information given at Rome to L. Cornelius Merula Pretor at that time of the City. For two bondflaves early in a morning before day, prefented themselves unto him, and opened from point to point in order, namely, what had been contrived and done, and what remained yet to do. The Pretor having taken order for their fafe custody at home within his own house, called the Senate together; where, after he had recounted and declared unto them what these informers had reyealed, he was commanded to go abroad to fearch out and repress this conspiracy. Forth he marched with five Lieutenants of the camp, and look how many he could meet with in his way all over the fields, villages, and hamlets, he tendred unto them a military oath, and confirained M them to arm and follow him. Thus in this halfy manner of levy, he armed well neer 2000, and with them all together (who knew not whither he meant to go, nor to what peece of fervice he led them) to Seria he came. At his first entrance, he suddainly in great hast apprehended the principal heads of the conspiracy; whereupon the slaves fled out of the Town. Then were sent out terrain into the fields, to trace and to find them out by their tracks. In this bufiness there were See the actwo bonds aves and one free man that performed fingular good service. Unto him the LL of the Senat gave order, that there should be paid 1 00000 Asses in brass coin: but unto the slaves 25000 and their freedom. For the redemption of whom, their masters were contented their full price out of the Chamber of the City. Not long after, it was reported that the remnant of this conspiracy purposed to surprise Preneste. Thither marched L. Cornelius the Pretor of the City, where he exe-N cuted about 500 persons who were found guilty. The City was in great fear to see how the hostages and captives of the Carthaginians practited such troubles. Therefore in Rome a standing watch was kept in every street: and the inferior Magistrats were charged to see to it and to walk the round, and the Triumvirs likewise (or three Sheriffs) to have a better eye and look to the Quarry-prison. The Pretor also directed his letters into all quarters of the Latin nation to this effect, That all the hostages should be kept within doors, and not suffered to go abroad into the ffreets: that all captives and prisoners should have gives about their heels of ten pound weight at least, and be kept in no other ward but in the common goal, count of the heft Claffis,

The same year came Embassadors from King Attalus, who presented in the Capitol a golden Crown of 246 pound weight, with great thanksgiving unto the Senate, that King Antiochus in O 22 6 lib. En. regard of the authority and countenance of the Roman Embassadors, had withdrawn his forces glish in angel out of the confines of Attalus. The same summer two hundred men of arms, ten Elephants, gold, or there- and 200000 Modii of wheat fent from King Mafaniffa, arrived at the camp in Greece. Likewife out of Sicily and Sardinia, there was fent great flore of victual and liveries for the army. In Sicily M. Marcellus was L. Governour, and in Sardinia M. Porcius Cato, an upright man and living without touch and reproach, fave only he was thought somewhat too severe in restraining of usury. He banished out of that Iland all usurers: he abridged also and cut off clean, the charges which the allies were wont to defray for the entertainment of the Pretor.

Sex. Alius the Conful being returned to Rome out of France in regard of the general affembly for election of Magiffrats, created Confuls Cn. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minutius Rufus, And two daies after, the election was held for Precors. This year first were chosen fix Precors, by reason that the number of Provinces encreased, and the Roman Empire and Seignory extended farther. And these were they, to wit, L. Manlins Volso, Cn. Sempronius Tudit anus, M. Sergius Si- Six Pretors lus, M. Helvius, M. Minusius Rufus, and L. Acilius. Of thefe, Sempronius and Helvius were E- first created, diles of the Commons; Q. Minutius Thermus and T. Sempronius Longus Ediles of the chair. The Roman games this year were four times renewed. Cn. Cornelius and Q. Minntins being Confuls. Rabove all things went in hand with the Provinces of Confuls and Pretors: and first they difpatched those that concerned the Pretors (a matter that might be decided by casting lots.) To Sergins fell the jurisdiction of the City, and to Minutius the forein, over strangers. Acilius was appointed to Sardinia, Manlius to Sicily, Sempronius to that part of Spain between Italy and Therus; and Helvius unto the other beyond the River.

When the Confuls were upon the point to cast lots likewise for their provinces; namely, Italy and Macedony, L. Oppius, and Q. Fulvius Tribuns of the Commons, interpoled themselves and staied them, alledging, "That Macedony was a province lying far off, and there was no one thing "that had more empeached and hindred the proceeding of wars to that day than this, I hat in fo remote parts, the Conful ever of the former year was called home before he were fetled in his C affairs, and when he should be emploied most in wars. Now have there four years aiready " gone over our heads, fince we decreed and concluded to follow the Macedonian war; during "which time, Sulpitius spent the greater part of his year in seeking after the King and his army; "Villius, when he should encounter the enemy, was called a way before he had effected any ex-"ploit; as for Quintius, he was kept at Rome Hill for the most part of the year, in attendance a-"bout Church-matters and sacrifices: howbeit the affairs of wars under his conduct were ma-" naged to well, that if either he had gone sooner into his province, or the winter had been later, "he might have dispatched the warsthere: and now, that he is ready to retire into his standing "camp and wintring harbors the report is, that he hath brought the war to that good pass and " forwardness, that unless he be not hindred by a new successor, in all likely-hood and apparence, "he will make a final end thereof the next fummer.

With these speeches they prevailed so much, that the Consuls for their part promised to be ordered and fet down by the Senat in this behalf, upon condition, that the Tribuns would be content to do the like. Now when of both fides, they had referred themselves to a free and absolute confultation, the LL, of the Senat affigued to both the Confuls the government of Italy, and continued the command of the army fill with T. Quintins, until there came another to succeed him. Two legions were appointed for the Consul, with commission to war upon the Gauls between Rome and the Alps, who had revolted from the people of Rome. And for Quintius ordained it was, that there should be sent into Macedony unto him, a new supply of 5000 foot, 300 horse, and 3000 fea-fervitors and mariners. And likewife, that the fame L. Quintius Flamininus should be E Admiral of the navy, as before. For the Pretors who were to go into Spain, there was an allowance of 8000 footmen out of the allies of the Latin nation, and 400 horiemen, fo that they difmissed the old souldiers out of Spain: and enjoined they were to limit and set out the bounds of their several provinces, whereas the higher Spain and the lower should part. And for Macedons there were two Lieutenants more for the army appointed, to wit, P. Sulpitius and P. Villius, who had been Confuls both, and in that province. Before that either Confuls or Pretors went out into their provinces, it was thought good to take order for the prodigious tokens which hapned. For at Rome the Temple of Vulcan and Summanus at Fregella, the wall and a gate of the City, were firiken with lightning. At Frusino it appeated light (as it had been clear day) in the night feason. At Asculum a Lamb was yeared ha-Fying two heads and five feet. Also at Formia two wolves entred into the Town, and worried somethat were in their way. Last of all, at Rome there was a wolf, that not only came into the City, but went forward as far as to the Capitol C. Acilius a Tribun of the Commons proposed a law, that there should be five Colonies conducted to the Sea fide, and there planted: two at the mouth of the Rivers Vulturnus and Liternus, one at * Pucoli, another in the Burrough Town of Salernum, and to make the fift * Buxentum * Puzzole. was adjoined to the reft. Into every Colony order was taken, that there should be thirty hou- * Pife ord N: sholds sent. The three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for the conducting of these Colonies ground Firest were created; namely, M. Servilins Geminus, Q. Minutius Thermus, and T. Sempronius Langus, Ligorio, Theleshree had commission to continue in the charge of this office three years. After the muffer, Gandall other matters accomplished, pertaining to God and man, that were by the Consuls to be performed, then they fet forward both, into their provinces. Cornelius took his way directly against the Insubrians, who accompanied with the Cenomans, were entred at that time into arms: Minmin in his journey bare on the left hand of Italy toward the nether sea; and conducting his army to Genua, began with the Ligurians to make war. Clostidium and Litubiam, Towns , both of the Ligurians, likewise two States of the same nation, the Celelats and the Cerdiciats furrendred unto him; infomuch as all the country on this fide the Po, were in subjection to the

Romans, except the Boians among the Gaule, and the Illusts among the Ligurians. By report H. there were fifteen Towns containing twenty thouland men, which yeelded unto them From thence heled the legions into the territory of the Boisns. The army of the Boisns had passed over the Po a little before, and joined with the Infubrians and Conomans: for hearing that the Confule would war jointly with both their forces, they intended likewife to make themselves more ftrong, by uniting and bringing their power together. But the bruit being blown abroad that once of the Confuls invaded and fired the country of the Boians, presently there arose a tumple. For the Boians demanded, that they all in general would help them in their diffress. The Insubrians refufed and faid. That they would not abandon their own confines : by which occasion they distanded. The Boians went to the defence of their own country, and the Infubrians with the Canomans. fat them down upon the banks of the River Mineins. Five miles beneath that place, the Conful I Cornelina also encamped himself neer the said River : from whence he sent certain messengers all about the villages, and to Brixia, the head City of that nation; and being advertised jufficiently that the youth was up in arms, without the warrant and consent of their ancients; and that the Canomans joined not with the Infubrians in their rebellion by vertue of publick counsel and authority; he fent for the principal perfonsamong them, and began to labour and deal with them, that the Canomans would torfake the Infubrians, and openly with their enfigns advanced, either to return into their own country, or turn to the Romans. This they could not bring them to : howheir they affured the Conful that in the field they would either fit ftill and do nothing, or elfe, if any good opportunity was preferred unto them, they would aid the Romans. The Infubrians knew nothing of this complot: and yet, some doubt and suspition they had, that their allies halted, and were not K found of all four: and therefore when there was occasion to lead orth to fight a field, they durit not trust them with either of the two wings and points of the battel, for fear if they retreated like falle brethren, they should hazard the main chance; but placed them behind the enfigos in the regrand. The Conful in the beginning of the battel vowed a Temple to Juny Sofpita, in cate he discomfitted the enemies that day, and put them to the rout. The fouldiers fee up a shout, and cried aloud that they would bring it to pais that the Conful thould have his delire, and there with charged the enemy right fiercely. The Intubrians could not abide the first shock. Some write, that in the very conflict the Conomans also suddainly fet upon their back, whereby they were distressed and in danger both before and behind; and that there were flain enclosed in the mids five and thirty thoufand of the enemies, and leven hundred taken priloners, and among them Amilear the General of L the Carthaginians, who was the cause of this war : also that there were a hundred and thirty enfigns carried away, and of chariots above two hundred. All the Towns that followed this revolt. yeelded to the Romans.

Ministins the Conful, at the beginning made excursions into the country of the Boians, wasting and spoiling it all over: but afterwards when they had fortaken the Intubrians, and were retired home to detend and five their own, he kept himfelf within camp, making full account to trie a let battel with the enemy. Neither would the Boisus for their part have been behind, but ready to have answered them, had not the rumor of the infubrians overthrow, daunted and broken their hearts. Whereupon they forfook their leader, quit the camp, and bestowed themselves in the Towns and Villages to guard every man his own, and quite altered the course of their enemy his M war, and put him besides his account. For the Consul past all hope now to determine the quarrel in one ranged battel, began again to forrage the fields, burn all buildings, and force Townsby affault. Much about the same time Clastidium was let on fire. And from thence the legions were conducted against the Iluats among the Ligarians, who only stood out and would not come in, and veeld obedience. Which nation like wife hearing that the Infubrians were defeated in a battel and that the Boians were to scared, that they durft not venture the fortune of a field, submitted themselves. At the same time the letters of the Consuls, containing their happy affairs in France, were brought to Rome. M. Sergins the Pretor of the City fielt read them in the Senat, and afterwards by the advice of the Senate, rehearfed them in a full audience and affembly of the people. Anda procession was decreed for the space of four daies.

Now was winter come, and whiles T. Quintius after the winning of Elatia, wintred his armies in divers harbors within Phoess and Locrie, there arole a mutiny in Opper. The one faction fent for the Atolians their neer neighbours to fide with them : and the other for the Romans. The Atolians came first, but the mightier faction would not fuffer them to enter in ; for having dispatched a messenger to the Roman General, they held the Town until his coming. The Kings garrison kept the fortress, neither could they be brought to abandon it either with the menaces of the Opuntians, or the authority and countenance of the Roman commander. The only let and flay why it was not immediatly assaulted was this; Because there was come an herald from the King, requelting time and place of a parle, which with much ado was granted to the King : not because Quitaisus of him el was not defirous and withed that he might be thought to have ended this was, o either by force of arms or conditions of peace; for as yet he knew nor whether one of the new Confuls should be sent to succeed him, or his government continued till tinto him (according as he had given his friends and kinsfolks in charge to bring that about by all the endeavour and means that he could make :) but he impposed verily, that this parting would be to good purpose for him, if it might be in his liberty to drive matters unto war if he ftayed Itill, or draw to a peace if he departed home. So upon the strand and shore of the gulf Malea, they choic a place neer unto Niera.

war with a brais beak-head. There accompanied him the chief Lie adaeedon, and Cycliadae a nobie perfonage of great mark among the Achaeans, and one that was from thence bandined, With the Roman General were King Aminander, Dienysidorus an Embassador of King Attalns, and Applimbrotus Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, Phaneas the chief and principal Magistrat of the Etolians, and two Achwans Ariftbenus and Xenophon. The Roman General in the mids of thefe. advanced himself forward to the edge of the very shore, even to the bank side, whiles the King came forward to the foredeck of his ship standing at anchor : and thus he began and said unto the King; "Sir, you may do better to come alhore that we may commune and confer tog: ther close, and both fpcak and hear one another more casily. The King refused to to do : and way to? quoth B " Quinting, who is it that you fear, if a man may know? Then with an hauty spirit and kinglike: I "fear none (quoth he) but the immortal Gods; but I trust not the fidelity of all that I fee here a-"bont you, and namely, the Atolians leaft of all other. Why (laith Quintins again) this is the "common case of all them that come to parly with enemies; namely, to be in danger one of ano-"ther. Yea mary, quoth the King, but by your leave Quinting, the price and recompence of trea-"chery and failhood (if it should come to that) is not all one for killing Philip and Phaneas ; for " the Ætolians should not find it so hard a matter to substitute another Pretor, as the Macedonians "to create another King in my room. This faid, there was not a word more to the point : while the Roman General thought it reason that he should begin who sought for a parle; and the King supposed it meet that it was his part to speak first who should give conditions, and not for him C that stood at receipt, and was to accept thereof. Then Quinting began and faid, that his foeech thould be plain and fimple : for he would fay no more, but propose only those points, which it they might not be performed, there would be no peace upon any condition at all. First, that the King mult withdraw his garrifons out of all the Cities of Greece. Item, That he is to deliver up all the prisoners and sugitive revolts that he hath, unto the allies of the people of Rome, Item, That he reftore again to the Romans all those pieces in Illiricum, which after the peace concluded in Epirus. he had teized upon. Last of all, that he surrender unto Ptolomeus King of Agypt, all those Cities which he possessed himself of, after the death of Ptolome Philopator. These (faith he) are the conditions, that I and the people of Rome do demand : but meet it is belides, that you hear the demands also of the allies. Then the Embassador or agent for King Attalus required, that the ships n and captives which had been taken in the Ses-fight before Chimathould be rendered and that Niepherium and the Temple of Fonse, which he had pilled and spoiled, should be restored as good and entire, as they were before. After him, the Rhodians made claim to Peras (a country in the continent right over-against their Isle, and an ancient appurtenance of their Seignory) and demanded withal, that the garrisons should quit Iasim, Bargilla, and the City of the Euromensians, and about Hellofponess. like wife the Cities of Seft and Abydos. Item, that Panopolis should be restored unto the Bizantins, with the ancient charter of their franchifes and liberties. Finally, that all the Merchant Towns and Ports in Afia might be freed from paying cultome. Then came upon him the Achæi, and challenged Corinth and Argi as their own. After them, when as Phaneas (the Pretor of the Ætolians) had demanded in a manner the same that the Romans had before; Enamely, that the Kings forces should depart out of Greece, adding moreover, that those Cities should be rendred unto the Ætolians which in times past belonged to their dominion and juriidi-Gion: then one of the heads of the Ætolians named Alexander, an eloquent man among them, as any other; prefently inferred and faid; "That he had a long time fitten still, and opened not his "mouth, not because he thought that in all this conference they would grow to any point or con-"clusion, but for that he would not interrupt any of his allies in their speech. And as for Philip, " quoth he he desleth not foundly and bona fide in treaties of peace, no more than ever beretofore "he hath managed his wars with vertue and true valour. For in all thete parlies and conferences the layeth trains, and lieth to catch advantages: in war he never itriketh a battail in plain field, "nor cometh to clote fight hand to hand; but in his retreats and flights, burneth and facketh Ci-Fifties; and thus being himself vanquished, spoileth and maketh havock of that which by right is "the due reward and recompence of conquerors. But the noble Macedonian Kings in old-time, took to fact courses. Their manner was to fight it out in open field, and to spare Cities and "Towns, all thit ever possibly they could; to the end that their dominion might be more wealthy "and pullfant. For what kind of policy is it, for him to ruinate and deftroy utterly that, about the * possession whereof he is in question, and releave nothing for himself but only war? This Philip "the year past hath laid desolate in Thessalie more Cities of his allies there, than all the enemies have done that ever The false had: and hath taken more from the Atolians themselves, while he was a confederate friend with them, than all the time that he was their professed enemy. He "hato feized upon Lyfimachia, expelled their Pretor, and chaled out the garrison of the Ætolians. Chios allo, a City under his own subjection he hath rased, subverted and quite destroyed. By semblablefallhood and deceit he is possessed of * Thebes in Phehia, Echinum, Larissa, and Pharsales. For the action Philip netled and galled at these words of Alexander, commanded that his ship should approach to necret to the bank, to the end that himfelf might be better heard. And as he began to frame bitter in 18, 19 Invectives against the Etolians principally, Phaneas cut him off, taying, That the quarrel was not other planeas to be decided by word, but with the tword : and either he must win it by mere force, or yeeld jesting merily at Phaneas, who was troubled with a pair of bad eies. And given he was by nature H to be pleafantly conceived age, and fuller of his frumps, I wot than beteemed the Majetty of a King: io as many times even in treaty of ferious matters and of great confequence, he could not forbear but make himself mery and laugh a good while. " Afterwards he sellto a fit of choler and "indignation, that the Ætolians should take upon them like Romans to command him out of "Greece, who if they were put to it, were not able upon their knowledge to fet down the bounds " of Greece & limit how far it reached. For almuch as the Agrei, the Apodeotes and Amphilochia which take up a great part of Leolia, are not within Greece. And what just cause (quoth he) of "complaint have they, in that I have not spared some of their allies? Why? even they themselves " hold this old custome for a law, namely, to permit their youth to take arms and serve against "their own allies, so they do it without the publick order and warrant from the State: and very I " often a man maylee Ætolians in contrary armies, & come to aid as wel the one fide as the other "As for Chius, it was not I that forced it: I did no more but aid Prusias my friend and ally in the "fiege and affault thereof. And as touching Lysimachia, I defended it against the Thracians; but "for almuch as of necessity I was called away from the guard thereof unto this war, the Thraci-"ans now hold it. Thus much by way of answer to the Ætolians. Now concerning Attalus and "the Rhodians, by right I owe them nothing: for it was not I but they, that began the war. "Howbeit, for the honor that I bear to the Romans, I will make reflictation to the Rhodians of " Peraa, and reftore I will to Attalus the ships and the captives as many as are forth coming and "may be found. As for the restitution and making good again of Nicephorium and the Temple of "Venus, what answer should I return to them that demand it, but this, that I will endeavour and K "be at charge of planting new trees (which is the only way and means whereby groves and " woods that are cut down and fallen, may be recovered again) feeing that ye will needs have it. that Kings (forfooth) must commune and reason to and tro about such matters as these. In the last place, he framed his speech to answer the Acharans: wherein, first he began with the benefits and pleasures that Antigonus had done unto that nation; then, of the favours and good "turns they had received from his own felf; and with all he commanded their decrees and edicts " to be read, containing all kind of honors as well divine as human: adding moreover the late "and fresh revolt of their army from him: and albeit he inveighed sharply against their disloy-"alty and treachery, yet he promised to render Argos unto them. As for Corinth, he would con-"fer and consult with the Roman General, and demand of him, whether he thought it reason L "that he should depart from those cities which he wan by arms, and held by right of conquest, or "disposses himself of those also, which he received from his progenitors as his lawful inheri-"tance? The Acheans and Ærolians addressed themselves to answer those points; but the sun was welneer down : whereupon the conference was adjourned until the morrow. Philip retired to the harbor from whence he came, and the Romans with their allies to their camp. The day following, Quintius at the time appointed was ready before the City of Nicea (for that was thought a convenient place.) But Philip appeared not, nor for the space of certain hours came there any at all from him, not fo much as a messenger. Now when they were out of all hope of his repair thither, behold of a suddain his ships were descried. For himself he said by way of excuse, that confidering how hard, how grievous and intolerable indignities were imposed upon him, he had M employed all that day time until then in confultation, and could not refolve. But it was generally thought among them all, that he had of purpose prolonged the time, and made it so late even toward evening, because the Achaans and Exolians should have no leifure to answer unto him. And this opinion of theirs himself confirmed, in that he requested that he alone might parly with the Roman General himself, and that all others should go aside and absent themselves; to the end they two might spend and lose no more time in debate and wrangling, but go briefly to the point, and make an end one way or other. This petition of his would not at first be accepted by Quinting, pretending that he would not have it teen that the allies were excluded out of the conference. But afterwards upon his importunat fuit, by the advise of them all the Roman General together with Ap. Claudius a Colonel, when the reft were voided away, advanced forward N to the bank fide: the King with the other two whom he had with him the day before came aland There after they had parled infecret together a certain time, they parted. What Philip related unto his company is not certainly known: but Quintius made report unto his allies of their conference in this wife: namely, that Philip was content to quit the whole coast and tract of Illyricum, for the Romans to enter upon. Item, to fend back all the traiterous renegats, and as many captives as were to be found. Item, to redeliver unto Attalus the ships and the mariners taken prisoners therein. Item to render unto the Rhodians the countrey of Perga: but in no wife to be differied of Iaffus and Bargylla. Item, to deliver unto the Ætolians Pharlalus and Lariffa, but not Thebes in any case. Last of all, to part not only with Argos, but with Corinth also, for the behoof of the Achaens. There was not one of them all well pleased at this limitation and setting out of particular parts, which he would deliver, and which he would not. For in this reckoning & account they should be more losers than winners. For unless (say they) he remove his forces and garrisons our of all Greece throughout, he will never cease to give or take occasions of quarrel, As they all cried out from the whole assembly to this effect, their high voyce was heard of Philip, albeit he flood aloof. Wherupon he requested Quintius to refer the whole matter once more unto the next day; and then certainly without fail, he would either perswade him and his allies and bring them

Obedience to the mightier. That is true, quoth Philip, and so evident, that a blind man may see it;

A to his mind, or elle would come off and fuffer himself to be perswaded and over-ruled by them The place of meeting was appointed upon the firand near Thronium: and thither they repaired on both parts betimes. There Philip first and toremost, belought both Quinting and all those that were present, not to disturb the hope of peace, but that it might come to some effect: and in conclusion, craved time wherein he might fend his Embassadours unto the Senat of Rome; assuring them, that if he could not obtain peaceunder those articles abovesaid, he would accept of any other conditions, which it should please the Senat to put upon him, All the rest missisked hereof, suppoling that he fought for nothing else but delayes and tract of time, whiles he might gather his forces together. But Quintins inferred again, That well it might so be and a truth indeed that they alledged, if it were summer time and a season fit for war and martial exploits: but now, consider-B ing winter was at hand, they could lose nothing by granting him respite to address an embassage. For neither (qd, he) will any capitulation and composition which we should make with Philin fland good and firm without the approbation of the Senat : and in this one winter (when of neceffity we must surcease from war) it may be known what the Senate by their authority will approve. To this advice the chief of the confederats accorded, and therein rested. So there was a ceffation of arms for two moneths granted : in which mean time it was thought good, that each of them likewife should dispatch one Embassador to advertise the Senate, to take heed they were not over-raught by the subtilty and fraud of the King. But provided it was in the covenant of the rruce aforelaid, That incontinently the Kings garrifons should void the territories of Phoeis and Locris, Quintius alio himself sent (together with the Embassadors of the allies) Aminunder King C of the Athamans; and to make the embaffage more honourable, Q. Fabias (his own wives filters fon) Q. Fulvius and P. Claudius accompanied the King.

When they were arrived at Rome, the Embaffadours of the allies had audience given them before those that were sent from King Philip, Most of their speeches were spent in railing against the King but in this one point they most of all moved the Senat to give ear unto them, namely, when they described by demonstration (as in a map) the situation of those countries as well by Land as Sea, that all menmight plainly see, that if the King might hold in his hands the City Demetrias in Theffalie, Chalcis in Eubwa, and Corinth in Achaia, Greece could not possibly be at liberty, confidering that Philip himself was wont to term them (no less truly than tauntingly) The shackles and fetters of Greece, After them were the Kings Embassadors permitted to enter into the Senat-D house: and having begun to make a long Oration, their speech was cut off with this one brief and short interrogatory, Whether Philip would quit those three Cities aforesaid, or no? Whereunto they made this answer, That they had no express warrant in their commission touching that matter by name. So the Kings Embaffadors were fent away without conclusion of any peace: and Quinting had full authority to determine of war or peace at his pleasure. Who seeing plainly by this, that the Senat was not weary of war, and being himself more desirous of victory than peace. he would never after grant Philip any more parlies, but gave him to understand, that he would admit no other embassage from him, but that which should bring him news of his departure

Philip seeing no other way now but that he must needs fight and trie the issue by a main bat-E tail, and that he was to gather his forces together from all parts: being perplexed most of all for the Cities of Achaia (a countrey far remote from him) and yet more careful in regard of Argi than Corinth; he thought it best policy to make it over (as it were upon trust) into the hands of Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, upon condition, That if he obtained the victory, Nabis should deliver it up unto him again; but if ought should come to him but well, then Nabis himfelf to have and hold it as his own. Unto Philocles, Governor of Corinth and Args he dispatcheth his letters, That he should himself in person commune with the tyrant above-named about it. Philocles, befides that he came now with a present, added moreover of his own head (for the better affurance and pawn of amity between the tyrant and the King) That Philip would give his daughters in marriage to Nais his fons. The tyrant refused at the first to accept of that City, Funless he were sent for, by a decree of the Argives themselves to come for to aid the City. But afterwards when he heard fay, That in a frequent affembly there, they not only rejected him, but also detested and abhorred the very name of a tyrant, as an execrable abhomination; supposing now that he had a good occasion and quarrel offered to make a spoil of them, he willed Philocles to deliver the City unto him when he would. So the tyrant was received into the Town in the night feafon, without the privity and knowledge of any person : and by break of day he seised upon all the higher places. The gates were shut, and sew of the principal heads in the beginning of the tumult made shift to escape. Those that were absent had their houses ransancked and their goods pilled: as many as were present, had all their gold and silver taken from them; besides, great sums of money were imposed upon them to be paid. They that made speed and G were not long about it, but tendred ready coin, were let go without any outrage or hurt done unto their bodies: but such as were inspected either to hide or keep ought back, were mangled and tortured like bondslaves. After this, he affembled the people together and published two Laws; the one, for croffing all debt-books and cancelling obligations: the other, for divifion of Lands among the people by the poll: two fire-brands to serve their turn that seek for change and alteration in a State; enough to fet on fixe the Commons against the Nobles and chief of a City, al and deposit to the

When the City of Argus was thus brought in lib jection under Natio, the vyrain never rememe a bring at whose hands, nor upon what condition he had received it, tent brillodisdors to Ettina unto Quintim, likewile to Attalm wintring then in Agina, certifying them. That Artor Wash his hands and at his devotion; and if Quintins would repair thither to parle with him the doublest not but they two should agree well enough in every point. Quintius granted to come this berto the end, that by this means he might disfurnish Philip of that garrison: and he fent like wile to Artalas, willing him, that he would depart from Egina and meet him at Sicyone: himself looked from Anticyra, and with ten Galeaces called Quinqueremes; which (as hap was) L. Quintinis hits brother some dayes before had put to sea out of the wintring harbor of Corerea, crossed overto Siegone. Now was Attalus there already, who making remonstrance unto Quintius, That it being came a tyrant to come unto a Roman General and not a Roman General to go unto a tyrant induced Quantins to condeicend unto his opinion, and not to enter the City of Argos, Not far from the City is a place called Mycenica, where they agreed to meet and commune together. Quitting came to the place, accompanied with his brother and certain Colonels. Attalus was guarded with his Princely and Royal train, N. coftrains the Pretor of the Achaans repaired thither, attended with some few auxiliary souldiers; and there they found the tyrant expecting their comine with all his forces. And armed as he was with his guard likewife armed he advanced himfelf into the midtl (well neer) of the plain that lay between. Quintius unarmed, came forward with his brother and two Colonels. King Analus likewise between the Pretor of the Achaans of the one hand, and a courriour of his on the other, both unarmed. The tyrant began the speech with an excuse, That being in arms and attended with a guard of armed men, he presented himself to a K parle feeing the General of the Romans and King Attalus unarmed: and faid that he flood not in fear of them, but of certain exiled persons of the Argives. After this, when they came to treat as tonching the conditions and covenants for the contract of an amity, Quimius the General demanded two things: the one. That Nabia would make an end of warring with the A. hai : the other, That he would fend with him cercain aids against Philip. And verily to fend succour he granted: and in lieu of peace he was content there should be a truce, until the war with Philes was dispatched. Also about Argos King Attalus beganto enter into some question, saying: That having the City treacher outly betrayed unto him by Philocles, he now held it by force of arms but he answered again, That he was sent for by the Argives themselves, for to protect them. Then the King required that the Argives might be affembled together, that he might know the truth. The tyrant made no denial thereof. The King replied again, that the affembly should be free, and at their liberry to fpeak, and to that effect the garrifons were to be removed out of the City, and no Lacedemonians intermingled among them; to the end that the Argives might frankly speak their mind, But the tyrant flatly denied to withdraw from thence the guards. So this arguing came to no conclusion, and the conterence brakeup, after that the tyrant had given the Roman General 600 Candiots, and a truce made for the term of four moneths, between Nicostratus Pretor of the Achezans, and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. From thence Quintius departed to Corinth, and approached the gate with a Regiment of Cretenfians, that it might appear to Philocles the Kings Captain there that the tyrant was revolted from Philip, Philocles also entred into a parle with the Roman General and when he was exhorted by him to depart out of hand and yeeld the City, he M returned such an answer unto him, that he seemed rather to defer, than to deny the thing. From Corinth Quintius croffed the Sea to Anticyra, from whence he fent his brother to found the nation of the Acarnanians. And Attalus departed directly from Argos to Sicrone. Whete the City not only encreased the ancient honours of the King, with the addition of new : but also the King over and befides that he had purchased for them in time past, the facred land of Apollo, with a great sum of money because he would not seem now also to pass by this friend City allied unto him, without some royal bounty and munificence, he gave freely unto them fix talents of filver, and 10000 Medimns of corn: and so returned to his ships at Cenchrea. Naba also having strengthened the garrison in Argi, returned to Lacedamon: and after himself had robbed the men of their mony and goods he fent his wife thither to do the like by the women. Who fending for the honourable & N worshipful dames of the City, inviting them one by one to her house, and otherwhiles many together at once such as were of kin one to another, by flattering and by threatning gat from them not only all the gold that they had, but in the end ftript off their apparel alfo, and all the jewels and ornaments that they wore.

adioyning in those quarters to Acamania. There was a freight pass or gullet there, half a mile almost in length, but not half a mile in breadth: at the end of this streight standeth the City Lencas planted against an hill that turneth to the East, and looketh toward Acarnania. The base Town is built upon a plain, reaching along the fea that divideth Leucadia from Acarnania, Whereupon the City, as well on the land fide, as by fea, is easie to be forced. For the foords of the water refemble a standing lake rather than a Sea, and the whole foil is a light earth, minable and easy to be wrought into, to that in many places at once the walls either undermined or shaken with the ram, came tumbling down. But as the Town it felf was affaultable, so the hearts of the Townsmen were in-C vincible. For night and day they gave not over, to repair the cracks of the shaken wal, to fill up the open breaches and ruins to make head infilly, and skirmish with the enemy, and rather to defend the walls by force of arms, than to lave themselves by strength of their walls. And surely a longer fiege they would have made of it than the Romans hoped but that certain banished perions, Italians born, dwelling in Leucas let in and received armed fouldiers on the Castle side. Howbeit, the Leucadians embattelling themselves in their market place, encountred them as they ran down from the higher ground with a great cry and noise, and maintained battel with them for a long time, In this mean while, the walls in diverse places were scaled with ladders, and the enemies mounting over the heaps of Rones that lay at the breaches, entred the Town. And now by this time the Lieutenant in person, with many companies environed them as they fought: some slain in the midst, n others flung away their weapons, and yeelded to the conquerour. After few dayes, upon the news of the field fought at Cynocephale, all the States of Acarcania came in, and submitted themfelves to the Lientenant.

At the same time, whiles fortune turned thus about, and bare down a side all at once; the Rhodians also sent out Pansistratus their Pretor, with 800 sootmen of Achaa & about 1900 souldiers well armed, gathered out of all forts of auxiliaries, to regain and reconquer from Philip the country of Peras, lying in the main and firm land, which had been held sometime, and possessed by their ancestours. And these aids were compounded and mixed of French Nisuers, Pituers, Tanians, and Areans of Affrick, and Laodiceans of Asia. With these forces Pausistratus encamped in the territory of Stratonicea, and there he seized of a commodious place, and very good for his purpose, E unwares to the Kings company that had holden the lame. Thither came allo to aid them in very good time, a Regiment of a 1000 foot and a 100 horse of Achaans, levied for that purpose, and were commanded by Theoxenus. Dinocrates a Captain under the King, willing to recover the laid hold again, first pitched his tents, hard against the enemies camp. But afterwards he removed to another fort in the territory likewise of Stratonicea, which they call Astragon: and having rallied together all the garrifons disperied asunder in divers places, and sent for the auxiliary bands also of Thessalians, even from Stratonicca, he took his way and marched toward Alabanda, where the enemies were. The Rhodians likewise for their partwere ready for battel, and after they were encamped of both fides neer together, immediatly they entred into the field to fight it out. Dinocratesplaced in the right point 500 Macedonians, and the Agrians he put in the left, in the main bat-F tel he bestowed all those that he had gathered together out of the garrisons belonging to the forts abovefaid, who for the most part were Carians, the points he flanked round about with his cornets of Horse. The Rhodian cohort was marshalled in this manner: The auxiliaries of the Candiots and Thracians kept the right point, the hired fouldiers (and they were a power of elect footmen) flood in the left, in the middl were the aids (a mixture of many nations:) the Cavalry and all the light armed fouldiers that were, compassed the corpers like wings. All that day the two armies stood only upon the bank of a brook which ran between them with a small and shallow water: and after some loose shot discharged, they retired into their tents. The next day they were ranged in like order, and struck a battail exceeding the proportion of their number; for on each fide there were not above three thouland foot, and upon a hundred horse: but they were even G matched not in number only and armour, but also in equal courage and hope alike. The Achæi first passed over the said brook, and charged upon the Agrians: afterwards the whole army ran as one would fay, over the River. The fight continued long doubtful. The Achai being of themselves in number a thousand, disordred some four hundred of the other, and sorced them to retreat, and afterwards the entire right point of the battail began to shrink and give ground. As for the Macedonians, so long as their battaillon called Phalanx, kept their array and stood close together, could not possibly be stirred or removed; but after their left side was laid naked, and they began to reach out on an all hands their long pikes against the enemy, charging them across upon H the flank, they were prefently troubled : and first they put themselves in disarray, afterwards they turned their backs, and last of all flung their weapons from them, and ran away for life; until they were come to Bargilia. Thither also was Dinocrates fled. The Rhodians having followed the chale as long as they had any day to see, retired into their camp. And for certain it is known, if in this train of victory they had presently made speed to Stratonicea, they might have been masters of the Town, and never drawn sword for it: but whiles they spent time in recovering the burrough Towns and forts of Peren, they let this opportunity flip out of their hands, and loft it for ever For in the mean space, they that lay in garrison and held Stratonicea, were encouraged, and took better heart. Dinocrates also anon with those forces of his that remained, put himself within the walls. Then was the Tower befieged and affailed, all in vain, neither could it be forced and won r but by Antiochus, a certain time after. Thus went the affairs in Theffalie, in Achea, and in Affa. much about one and the felt-same time.

Philip being advertised that the Dardanians were entred within the confines of his realm, and wasted the high country of Macedony, albeit he saw that almost in all parts of the world unhappy fortune still followed and coursed both him and his wheresoever they were: yet esteeming it more grievous and heavy than death it felf to be differzed of the possession of Macedony also, he made a levy in great hast out of all his cities of fix thousand foor, and 500 horse; with which power of Macedonians, he suddainly surprised the enemy (unprovided and not aware of his coming) about Stobi in * Pelagonia. Great numbers of men were flain in conflict, but more in the fields, fuch as were disbanded, and ranged abroad for greediness of booty and pillage. But as many as could re make means to flie more readily and eafily away never flood out the tryal of a battail, but returned home into their own countrey. Having thus put life as it were again into his men by this one expedition and exploit (a matter of no confequence to the total adventure of his whole effate) he retired himself to Theffalonica.

The Punick war was not atchieved and brought to an end to happily and in fo good a time for the Romans (who otherwise should have warred at once both against the Carthaginians and Philip) but it fell out as well and in as fit a feafon, that Philip was now vanquished; just against the time that Antiochus in Syria prepared to levy war against them. For besides that the service was much more easily managed against them single and apart, than it would have been if they had banded both at once, and brought their forces together, it chanced also that Spain about the very t fame inflant brake out to a tumultuous infurrection, Antiochus being returned to Antioch there to winter, after he had the fummer before brought under his subjection all the Cities belonging to Prolomans, within the country of * Cale-Syria. was yet never the more at quiet, and mindful ofpeace afterwards. For when he had aftembled a puissant power both of Land and also of Sea-forces, and purposed to employ the whole strength of his realm, he sent afore by Land in the beginning of the spring, his two sons Ardues and Mithridates with a mighty army, commanding them to attend him at Sardis: himself in person set forth a Voyage by Sea, with a fleet of a hundred fail of covert ships with decks and hatches, besides two hundred lighter Vessels, as Galions and Brigantins, purposing at one time to assay all the Cities in * Cilicia and Caria, coasting along the Sea fide, which were within the Dominion of M Ptolomaus: and withal to aid Philip as well with shipping as souldiers, for as yet Philip was not utterly subdued, nor the war with him brought to a final end. Many brave and worthy exploits enterprised the Rhodians both by Sea and Land, in their loyalty and faithfulnes to the Romans. and for the fafeguard and defence of all the Greekish Nation. But no one thing shewed their magnificence more than this, that being nothing terrified at that time with fuch a World of wars threatned against them, they sent Embassadors to the King, to let him understand, that if he sailed forward and stayed not his Armado, they would encounter him at the Bay of Nephelis (which is a promentory or Cape of Cilicia, renowned for the ancient league of the Athenians.) And this they did, not upon any hatred they bare to his person, but to impeach him only for coming to join with Philip, thereby to hinder the Romans in their good course of setting Greece at liberty. N At the same time Antiochus was busied in the siege and assault of Coracefium, against which he had placed all ordnance and engins of battery: for he was already mafter of the Cities of * Zephyrium, Soli, * Aphrodisias and * Corycus, and having doubled the point of * Anemurium (a Cape or forland also of Cilicia) he had won likewise the City of * Selinus. All these, and many other forts of that coast being yeelded unto him by composition, either for fear or willingly, without any affault, only Coracefium thut their gates against him, and staid his progress beyond his expectation. There the Embassadors of the Rhodians had audience. And albeit that embassie was such as might have set a King into a fit of choler and chased his bloud, yet he tempred his anger, and made answer that he would fend his Embassadors to Rhodes, and give them in charge to renew the ancient rights and privileges as well of his own as of his ancestours with that City and State, O and to will them not to stand in fear of the Kings coming, for that neither they nor any allies of theirs should sustain harm or damage by him. For it was no part of his meaning to insringe and break the amity which he had with the Romans, as it may appear as well by his late embaffie

fent unto them, as also by the honorable decrees and answers made by the Senat and sent unto For it fortuned that even then the Embaffadors of King Antiochus were returned from

Rome, having had a friendly audience there, and a gracious dispatch, according as the time re-

A quirede focas yet the issue of the was against Philip was uncertain. Whiles the Kings Embassa-dors delivered these points in the assembly of the Roddans, there arrived a post with news, that the wat was ended by means to a victory archive of by the Romans against Philip at Cynologybele. The featidings being once heard, the Rhodiane part all fear now of Philip were of advice to meet Animibus at les with their payy. For they had a second care besides which they neglected not. to maintain the liberty of those allied Cities persaining to King Protony, against which war was menaced from Assimbus. Some they succoured with sending aide unto them, and others by some can and giving shem warming of the delignments and enterprises of their enemies: whereby shey were a cable, that the Caunit, Mandit, they of Halicarna [14] and Samar enjoyed fill their entire freedom. But medlels it is forme, to profecute all the occurrents and affairs that paffed R in their parts, considering how I shall hare enough to do, and hardly be able to fet down and go through with those that properly concern the Roman war. At the fame time also King The commend Attention was brought fick from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this world in the leven-dation of King teenth wear of bis age, when he had reigned forty four. This man was beholden to fortune for attalm, nothing elle but siches, that might commend him to the hope of a kingdom. He employed the same with such wildome and magnificence, that first in his own conceit, and afterwards in the jadgment of others, he was not thought unworthy to be a King. Afterwards when he had vanquithed in one battell the Gauls (a nation at that time newly arrived in Afia, and therefore the more dread and terrible) he took upon him to be filled King, and ever after carried a mind answerable to the grandeur and Majesty of that name. His own subjects he governed with singular C inflice. To his allies he shewed himself most fast and faithfull. His friends he used with all kindneis and bounty, A wife and four children he had living when himfelf diec's and left his kingdom foline and well ferled, that the possession thereof continued firm to the third distent and genera-Whiles things flood thus in Afia, Greece, and Macedony, and the war with Philip scarcely ended, or at least wife peace not fully concluded, there arole a mighty war in the Province of Spain beyond the river Iberus. M. Helvius at that time was governorthere, who by his letters advertifed the Senat, That Calcus and Luscimus, two Princes in those parts, were gone out, and had taken arms; that with Coleas there banded seventeen towns, and with Luseinus the firong and puissant Cities Cardo and Eardo; that the whole fea coast, which bitherto by open re-D volt shewed not their rebellious heart, would doubtless upon the commotion of those their neighbours, make likewise an insurrection together with them. After these letters were read by M. Sergius the Prator, who had the perisdiction between Citizens and aliens, the LL. of the Senat ordaned, that after the election of new Practors was part; he to whole lot the government of Spain fell, should propose unto the Senat in all convenient speed as conching the war in About that very time the Confuls repaired to Rome (from their Provinces) who held an afferby of the Senat in the Temple of Bellona: and when they demanded triumph in confideration of their good service, and happy exploits in war atchieved: C. Asimiss Labeo and C. Wafaning. Tribunes of the Commons required, That the Confuls should speak severally by themselves con-E cerning triumph: for suffer them they would not jountly to propound that thing in the house, to the end, that equal and temblable honour should not be conterred upon persons of unlike qualizy, worth, and defert. And when Minuins inferred again and faid, That the Province of Italy tell unto them both in one commission, and Cornelius seconded him withall, averring, That he and his companion in government had managed all their affairs with one mind by common countell and advice; that the Boians who passed over the river Po against him for to succour the insubrians, and Carnomans, were forced to turn back again to defend their own, by reason that the other Conful his Collegue made such waste and pillage in their fields and villages. The Tribanes confessed, that Cornelius indeed had archieved to worthy exploits in war, that there was no more doubtito be made of his triumph, than of rendring praise and thanks to the immortall f gods; but neither henor any other Citizen Good ever at any time in such grace, favour, and credit, that having obtained she honour of attiumph for himself, he should impart that glory unto his Codlegue and fellow, like were so thameless as to crave it. As for Q. Minutius (lay they) homade some sleight akirmishes with the Ligurians not worth the talking of: mary in France he loft a good number of his fouldiers. And with that they named T. Juventius and Cneus the brother of Libes, two Colonels of Tribunes of the camp, who were flain in an unfortunate battel, with many a brave and hardy man bondes, as well Citizens as allies. And to conclude, there were formerfew towns and villages colourably yielded and rendred up for the time, without any affucance and fecurity. These junglings and debates between the Confuls and the Tribunes continued for twadaies: but in the end, the Confuls being overcome with the importunity of the Tri-G banes, were concent to propose the matter diffinely by themisives. And withthe generall voice and necord of all, a triumph was decreed for Cn. Cornelius. The Placentins also, and men of Cremona, mese a great cause that this Comful found more favour; by reason that they gave thanks, and repotestion his behalf, that they were delivered by his good means from the fiege, yea, and most establishment experience from servitude out of the hands of their enemies, Q. Minutius having only centa profer and made an affay of proposing his cause to the Senat, seeing them wholly banded and the against thim, faid aloud, That immaintenance of Confular authority, and by vertue of that place, ves, and according to the good examples of divers noble and renowned perionages, he if "Would thumbh, and aske them no leave, in the mount Alban, But Co. Cornelius whiles he was fill in office triumphed overthe Infubrians and Canomans. He carried in pomp before him a number of military enlighest he caused great flore of French spoil and pillage to pass in a passant upon Charriors taken from the enemies. Many Noblemen of France were led in a flew beforehis own triumphant chariot: among whom (as some write) was Amilear Generall of the Carthaginians. But above all others, the goodlieft fight was, a number of Coloners and inhabitants of Cremona atid Placentia, who with bonets or caps of liberty on their heads followed his chariotis He bare that they were in triumph 237500 Sefferces. 7900 Bleats of filver coin, He divided among his hortemen fevenby him treed by Alfes apecie, to every horieman he gave double, and to each Centurion trebble to much Q. Mitom captivity. intim likewise triumphed in mount Alban over the Ligurians and the Boians in Ganda. The honour of this triumph as it was less, in regard of the place, and of the name that went of his acts as also because all men knew full well, that the charges went not out of the common Chest or Camher of the City: to for number of enfigues, of chariots and spoils gained from the enemies, it was in manner equall and comparable to the other, And of money he brought well-near as much as Cornelius: for of brass coin he had in shew 254000 Asses, of silver coin in Bigat peeces 53200. To common fouldiers or footmen, to Centurions and horlemen, he gave as much as his Collegue, Afrer this triumph there was a generall affembly held for the election of Magistrats : wherein were Created Confus, L. Furius Purpurio, and M. Claudius Marcellus. The next day after thele Prators were cholen. Q. Fabius Buteo, T. Sem pronius Longus; Q. Minutius Thernus, M. Acitius Glabrio, L. Apuftius Fullo and C. Lalius.

In the end of that former year, letters came from T. Quintius with this intelligence, That he had fought in battell ranged with King Philip within The flaty, where the army of the enemies was defeated and put to rour. These letters were first read in the Senat by Sergins the Prator, and then by order from the LL, in the publike affembly of the people. For this happy success, it was ordained. That there should be solerin processions for five daies. Shorely after there arrived Embaffadors both from T. Quintun, and also from the King. The Macedonian Embaffadors were brought without the City to the place or hamlet called Villa publica, where they were appointed their lodging, rich prefents were given them, and allowed they were the charges for themselves and their train. In the Temple of Belloia the Senat was affembled, where there paffed not many words by reason that the Macedonians promited, That the King should perform whatsoever the L Senat would fet down. So (according to the ancient custome and manner) there were appointed ten Committees or Delegats; by Whore advice and coupsell T. Quintins the Generall, was to present and tender unto Philip, articles and conditions of peace: provided, that in the laid number of Delegats, P. Sulpitius and P. Valerius should be comprised by name; who when they were Confuls governed the Province of Macedony. The same day, the Cossans demanded and made suit. That the number of their Coloners or inhabitants might be augmented: whereupon an order was granted That there should be a thousand new enrolled to the former: with this proviso, that in this number none of them should be matriculated, who after the Consulship of P. Sulpitius and P. Villius Had been enemies to the people of Rome. The Roman games and plaies were that Year exhibited as well in the Circus as upon the flage in the Theatre, by the Ædiles Curule L.Cor- M nelins Scipio and Cn. Manlius Volfo: which, as they were let out with more state and magnificence . . than ever before, so they were beheld with more joy, contentment and pleasure, in regard that all things fell out fo fortunatly in the wars : and they were renewed and represented all thrice over, As for the plaies called Plebeinthey were let forth no less than seven times one after another. AviljurGlabrio and C. Ladius exhibited thole pattimes: who also of their filver that arose of fines and forfestures, caused three cast images of brass to be made, and erected them to the honour of Ce-

Now when L. Furius and M. Clandius Marcellus were entred into their Magistracy, and after queftion made concerning their Provinces, the Senat passed a decree, That both of them joyntly thould govern Italy; they requested that they might cast lots for Macedony and Italy together, N Marcellus more delirous of the twain of the Province of Macedony, alledged, that the pesce was not found but counterfeit, pretended, and deceitfull; and that the King would take arms and war again, in case the army were withdrawn from thence: by which words he put the LL. of the Sehat into a deepstudy and suspence, what to do, or to think of it. And haply the Consuls had obtained their request, but that Q. Martins Rex, and C. Atinius Labeo, two Tribunes of the Commons, protefled, that they would oppose themselves and cross it by their negative voice, unless they might first propose unto the people to know, Whether their will and pleasure was to entertain peace with King Philip, or no? This bill being preferred and read in the Capitoll before the people, was granted, and all the tribes or wards, even five and thirty, every one gave their aftirmative voice, "tri rogaftis [i.e. So be it as ye demanded.] And to the end, that all men might have O more cause to rejoyce that peacewas confirmed with Mncedony, there came heavy news out of Spain, and letters were divulged abroad, containing thus much, That C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Vice-Prator in the hither Province of Spain, was vanquished in battell, that his army was difcomfitted and put to flight, and divers men of name and mark flain. That Tudit anus himself was carried forth of the conflict grievoully wounded, and foon after died. The Province of Italy was al figned for both the Confuls with those two legions which the former Confuls had in charge, and

A order granced, that they should kevy and enroll four new legions, whereof two should be sent whither it pleased the Senar to appoint; and T. Quintius Flamininus was commanded to rule his Province still with the same army, and his Commission of longer government was renewed. After this, the Pravors cast loss for the parting of their Provinces. L. Appssitus Fusho obtained the jurif-diction of the Citizens of Rome, and M. Acilius Glastree was L. Chief Justice between Citizens and fortainers. Q. Fashin Brave had the government of the base or farther Spains, and Q. Minnatius Thermus of the higher or hither Spain, To C. Latius fell Stielly, and Sardinia to T. Sempronus Longus. And ordained it was, that unto Q. Fashin Buteo, and Q. Minnatius, to whom the rule of the Provinces in Spain beefil, the Constitutional on of those tour legions which they had enrolled, deliver one legion apeece, which they thought good and of allies and of the Latine nation, four B thousand footmen besides, and three hundred horizment to either of them. And these Pravors were enjoyned to go to their charges with all freed possible.

The war in Spain began afresh, in the sifth after that the former together with the Punick war was ended. But before that these Prators went forth to this war (which may be counted as it were new, in regard that the Spaniards now first, and never before, warred in their own proper name, without either leader or army of Carthage) and before that the Consids thenselves departed out of the City, order was given, that according to the old custome they should provide for the prodigious tokens that were reported 1.7 justua as he rode on horieback into the Sabins country, was both himself and his horse under him strucken dead with lightning. The temple of Feronia in the terratory of Capena, was likewise smitten and biested from heaven. At the Temple of C Monetas, the Iron heads of two ipears were sent to burn on a light fire. A Wolftpopped to enter into the City at the gate Esquilina and ranthrough the most populous part thereof as sia as unto the market place, and to not ward to the Tusan street, and from thence through the Melium, and passed forth again at the gate Capena untouched, and in manner without taking any harm.

These prodigious signs were purged by the factifices of greater beats. At the same time Cn. Cornelius Lentusus, who had governed the Province of high Spain before Tuditanus, entred the City by order from the Senat in a kind of triumph, and carried before him in pomp 1515 pound weight of gold: of silver likewise in bullion 2000 opound weight: and in coin 34550 deniers. L. Stertinius strom the nether Spain, brought into the treasury 5000 pound weight of silver, and never pretended any hope that he had to obtain a triumph. Moreover, of the prizes and spoiles D won from the enemies, he caused two arches to be erected in the beast market, even before the Temple of Fortune, and the goddess Matura: and one besides in the grand Citque or shew-place. And upon these arches he set up guided Statues. These were all the attairs, to speak of, that passed this winter-season.

There wintered at that time in Athens Quintius, And among many other futers that came unto him with their petitions, the Bootians exhibited a request, and obtained the same, to wit, that as many of their nation as had lerved in the warsunder Philip, might be reflored and fent home again unto them : which was easily granted by Quinius, not so much, for that he thought them worthy of that favour, but because he was to win the love and affections of the States in Greece unto the Roman name, now especially that he had some doubt of King Antiochus. They were E not delivered fo foon, but feen it was, how little the Bootians would be beholding to him for it. For they fent presently unto Philip, and gave him thanks for the rendring of those men, as if they had been delivered by him, and nor by Quintim and the Romans. And in their next affembly generall for their solemn election, they chose one Barcillas for their Bootarches, or Lord governour of Bastia; for no other reason, but because he had been the Colonell of those Bootians that bare arms for the King: but they passed by Zeuseppun, Pisistratus, and others, that had perswaded to make a league with the Romans. This wrought discontentment in these persons for thepresent; and sear for the time to come. For thus they reasoned with themselves, if they would do thus while the Roman army lay encamped near to their gates, what should become of them when the Romans were departed into Italy, and whiles Philip was so near at hand to affilt those F that fided with him, and to annoy those of the adverse part and faction? Therefore they complotted and concluded in the end to make away Barcillas, the head of the Kings bend, whiles the Roman forces were at hand. And so chusing a convenient and sit opportunity for their purpose, atwhattime as he returned homeward drunkfrom a publike folemn feath accompanied with certain pleasant and effeminat persons, who to make sport and mirth had been at that greatseast; he was lorelaied and befer with fix armed men, whereof three were Italians, and three Ætolians, and formurdered. His train that attended him ran away, and raifed hue and cry, and called for help. Muth trouble and hurly burly there was throughout the City, much running to and fro with torthelight. But they that did the deed were escaped out at the next gate. In the morning betimes the people in great number assembled in the Theater, being called together by the voice Cofrthe common Beadle, as if the murderers had been deteched. Openly it was in every mans monhithat he was killed by his own retinue, eventhose filthy wanton persons that he had about him but fecretly in their minds they deemed Zeusippus the author of the murther. For the prefent it was thought good to apprehend them that were in his train, and that they should be examined, Whiles learth was made for them, Zousippus came forth into the assembly, with the like intent to avertall suspicion of crime from himself, saying, that men were much deceived to think that so horrible and strange a murder was committed by such weaklings & persons as they were.

This he argued and discoursed by many likelihoods and probabilities to the same effect; by which H means some were verily perswaded, that if himself had been guilty of the fact, he would never have offered and prelented himself in the face of the assembly, or broached any words at all of the murder, especially when no man urged him thereto. Others there were again, who made no doubt, but by this impudent face, his drift was to prevent an accusation, and to turn away all fulpition from himself. The innocent and guiltless creatures within a while after being examined upon the rack and tortured, knowing what was the general opinion and conceit of men, made their ule of the same for to bolt out and reveal the fact; and so they named Zeusippus and Pisistratus for the principals; without any presumption or light given how they should seem to come to the knowledge of anything. Howbeit Zeusippus accompanied with one Stratonidas) fled by night to Tanagra, fearing the remorfe and prick of his own conscience more than the appeaching and in- 1 formation of those persons who neither were party nor privy to any thing. But Pilifratus making no regard of thele accusers, remained still at Thebes. Now had Zensippus one bondslave, (whose hand was in all this action, and had been a courrier between) whom Pififtratus feared that he would bewray him, and by that very fear caused him to open and declare the whole matter. He dispatched therefore his letters unto Zeusippus, advising him to rid that flave out of the way, who was privy to their dealing; advertifing him, that in his conceit he was not fo meet to conceal the thing now done, as he was a fit infirument at the time to execute the same. The bearer of these letters he straightly charged to deliver them unto Zeusippus immediatly with all speed. But he, because he could not spy a convenient time to meet with him himself, gave the letters to the very fame flave whom he supposed to be most fast and trusty to his Master: adding moreover, and say- K ing, That they came from Pifferarus unto Zousippus, and imported matter of great consequence. The bond flave promifed to deliver them incontinently, but being touched in confcience, he was so bold as to break them open; and when he had read them through, he fled back in great fear to Thebes (where he bewrayed Pififratus.) Zeusippus troubled in spirit for the flight of his bondman, retired himself to Athens, supposing it a place of more security to live in, as a banished man. As for Pififtratus, after he had been divers times examined upon the rack, was put to death in the end. Thismurder wondrously estranged the Thebans and Bocotians, and set their hearts against the Romans; infomuch as they hated and detefted them to death, taking great indignation that Zeulippus fa principall and chief personage of their nation) had committed so foul and hainous a fact. To rebell in open terms, they had neither force sufficient to maintain them, nor a principall head L to direct and lead them. Whereupon they fell to that which is next coufin to plain war, even to thieving and robbing by the high waies fide, in such fort, as they surprized as well some souldiers who lodged near unto them, and were their guests, as others that wandred and ranged abroad from the garrifons in wintertime, and travelled about their affairs, who otherwhiles were caught up by the way, and came short home. Some passengers were killed in the port-rode-waies, by those that lay in wait for them in notorious thievish corners: others were trained and led deceitfully through by-lanes into defert places, there to take up their innes and lodging, and then were murdred. At length they plaid these pranks not only of malice unto them, but also for greedy defire of booty and spoil, by reason that commonly these waitaring men went about their trade and merchandise, and therefore had some charge about them, and carried filver in their belts. M Now when as at first there were some out of the way, and every day more than other many men miffing, and no man knew what was become of them, all * Baotia began to have an ill name, and the fouldiers were more affraid to travell there, than in the enemies country. Then Quintius sent certain Embassadors to all the Cities for to make complaint of these robberies and enormities. Many footmen there were found dead about the mear or lake * Copais, where their carkaffes were raked forth of the mud and mire, and drawn out of the standing water, tied and fashed as they were to heavy stones or some great vessels, that by their poilethey might be plunged, and fink to the bottom. Many such like outrages were found to have been committed at Acraphea and Coronea, Quintius at the first demanded to have the offendors delivered unto him, and for five hundred fouldiers (for so many were caught up by the way and murdred) he enjoyned the Boo- N tians to make payment of five hundred talents of filver. But the Cities would do neither the one nor the other: only they paid with bare words, and excused themselves in that nothing had been done by publike warrant or counsell from the State. Whereupon the Embassadors were sent to Athens, and into Achaa, to make protestation unto their allies, that they would pursue the Bootians with open war, upon good ground and just cause offered, And so after he had given commandment unto P. Claudius to go unto Acraphea with one part of his forces, himself with the other set him down about Coronea, and planted fiege unto it. But first the territory was laid waste, all the way as the two armies marched from Elaia in divers quarters. The Bootians plagued with these losses and calamities, seeing nothing but sear and flight in every place, sent their Embassadors unto him: but when they could not be admitted into the camp, the Acharans and the Athenians were O fain to come with them. The Achaens were of greater credit, to entreat in their behalf: for unless they might obtain pardon and peace for the Bootians, they determined also to enter into the quarrel, and to make war themselves. By whose mediation the Bootians had access unto the Roman Generall, and audience granted. Who after they were enjoyeed to deliver up the offenders and malefactors to Justice, and to pay thirty talents for amends and satisfaction, obtained peace: and fo the fiege was raised.

A . After forme few dates, the ten Delegans on Committees from Rome were arrived, by whose advice and counfell peace was articled and capitulated with King Philip, upon these conditions: Imprimis, That all the Greek Cities, as well in Europe as in Afra, should enjoy their liberty, and live under their own laws. Item, That Philip should withdraw his garrifons out of as many of them as had been in subjection under him. Item, That he do the like by those which were in Afra to wit, Euromos, Pedasa, Bargylla, Iassus, Myrinu, Abydus, Thassus, and Perinthus: all which the Romans required to befree. As concerning the liberty and freedom of the Cyani, it was covenanted That Quintins should write his letters to Printing the King of Bithynians, giving him to understand the advice and pleasure of the Senat, and the ten Delegats aforefaid. Item, That Philip render all the prisoners and sugitive traitors to the Romans, and yield up all the covered ships with R hatches: and over and besides, one huge royall Galliace or Argosey, which by reason of the exceeding bigness was unweildy and of little use, and was directed with fixteen banks of oars on a fide, Item, That he should not have above five hundred men in arms, nor one Elephant at all. Item. That he should not war (but by leave and permission of the Senat) without the marches of Macedony. Item, That he payunto the people of Rome a thouland calents, the one half in hand, and the other at ten payments, within the term of ten years. Valerins Antias writeth moreover, that there was imposed upon him a tribute of four thousand pound weight of silver yearly for ten years: and befides, twenty thousand pound weight prefently. The same author faith, that expresly it was capitulated, that Philip should not war at all with Emmenes the son of Attalus, who was newly come to the crown. For the affurance of these covenants, there were received hostages, and a-C monest them Demetrius King Philip his son, Valerius Antias hath written moreover, that the Island Agena, and certain Elephants were given in pure gift to Attalas in his absence: and that upon the Rhodians was bestowed Stratonicea, a City in Caria, with other Cities also which Philie had possessed. To conclude, that the Athenians received of free gift these Isles following to wit. Paros Imbros Delos and Sevres. When all the States of Greece approved and thought well of this peace, only the Ætolians lecrerly muttered & found fault with this order fet down by ten Delegats abovefaid: giving out that they were but bare letters and vain words, shadowed with a counterfeit apparance of liberty. For to what end, fay they, should some Cities be delivered to the Romans, and those not named ? others again be named, and yet order taken, that they without delivery should be free? but only D for this purpole, that those Cities which are in Asia should be set free, because they be far off and therefore in more fafety; but those that are in Greece, being not precisely named, should be forfed upon by them to wit, Corinth, Chalcis, and Oreum, with Eretrias, and Demetrias. And to fav a truth, this finding fault of theirs was not altogether frivolous, and without occasion given: for some doubt there was of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: because in the order and act of the Senat. by vertue whereof thoseten Delegars aforesaid were sent from the City, all other Cities of Aga and of Greece were doubtless in plain terms freed: but as touching these three before named, the Delegats had in commission to take order, as they should see it stand with the good of the Common-wealth, according to their own judgment and diferetion, and the trust that was committed unto them. For well they wift that King Antiochus would pass over into Europe, so E foon as ever he could bring his affairs about to his mind, and unwilling they were on any hand, that these Cities to commodious for his designs, should lie open and ready to his hand for to seize upon at his pleasure. So Quintins together with the ten Delegats sailed from Elatia to Anticyra, and from thence to Corinth, where they held their Councill and consulted of their affairs, Quintim would very often fay unto them, That all Grocce might be delivered and fet at liberty, if they could reftrain the tongues of the Etolians: if they were willing that their good affection should be deemed fincere, and the majefty of the Roman name maintained among all: finally, if they would pretend and make it known abroad, that they were passed the seas to set Greece free, and not after they had shaken off the seignory of Philip, to translate it unto themselves. The other again contradicted nothing as touching the liberty of those Cities: howbeit, they made remon-I firance, that it was the fafer course for them, to remain awhile under the protection and fafegard of the Romans than that inflead of Philipthey should receive Antiochus for their Lord. In conclusion decreed it was, That Corineh should be rendred to the Achaens, but yet so, that there should be a Roman garrison in the highest quarter of the City called Acrocorinthus. Item, That Chalcis and Demetrias should be recained first, untill such time as they were no more in sear and

Now approached the ordinary folemnity of the lithmian games, unto which at all times unially there was great recourse of people, as well in regard of the naturall disposition of that nation (desirons to see since of mere strength, or a significant of the trial of materies in all kind of arts, in all feats either of mere strength, or a significant and nimbleness of the bödy.) as also in especiation to divers and sindry seas. But being amused in expectation to know what the estate thicker by two divers and sindry seas. But being amused in expectation to know what the estate of Greece, and what their own particular condition would be becaster, divers men not only devised screenly with themselves, but also gave out and whispered in their speech and talk. Well, the Romans were set to behold this solemnity: and the publike Cries with a trumpetter went forth into the inside of the Cirque or shew-place, from whence the manner was to proclaime the sports and games according in a solemn set form of words: and after he had by found of trumpet made silence, he pronounced with a loud vice in this manner, Be it known unto all men that the H "Senat of Kome, and T. Quintim the General of their army, having vanquished King Philip and "the Macedonians, do ordain, that the Corinthians, the Phocenhans, and the Locrenhans, be all "free, and delivered frow all taxes what soever, and to live according to their own laws. Item, That the Isle Eulea, the Magnesians, Thesialians, Perrhabians, Acheans, and Phthiots do enjoy the "like freedom and immunity. And confequently herehearfed all the nations which had been in " subjection to Philip. Upon this proclamation of the beadle there was such joy, that men were not able to conceive and comprehend it. Every man could hardly believe that he had heard the thing which he fo wished and defired afore to hear: one looked upon another wondring at the matter, as if it had been a vain vision or illusion of some dream: and well they trusted not their own ears in hearing that which particularly concerned every one, but enquired of them that flood next I unto them, The Crier was called back again: fuch a defire had each one not only to hear the glad tidings, bus also to behold the happy messenger of this their liberty: and no remedy there was, but once again he must publish and pronounce the same. Now when their joy was once confirmed, they fet up such a shout, and followed it so with clapping of hands, redoubling the same so often. as evidently it appeared, how there is no earthly good in the world more pleafing and welcome unto a multitude than is liberty. After this, the games were performed in such halte, that neither the mind of any man was bent to intend, nor the eye busied to behold the fight thereof, so wholly had that one joy possessed them and forestalled the sence of all other pleasures and delights. But when the passimes were once ended, they all in manner ran apace to the Roman Generall, in such fort that his person was insome danger of the multitude, crowding so hard upon him alone, for w defire they had to come unto him, to touch his right hand, and to cast garlands of slowers and labels of fundry colours upon him: but being a man fast upon three and thirty years of age, both the vigour of youth, and also the joy that he took for the accomplishment of so glorious an act, afforded himfirength enough to abide the press of the people. This gladnels of all men shewed it felf not only for the present, but continued also for many daies space, entertained not only in thankful minds, but expressed also in joyful discourses: namely, "That there was one nation yet in the world, which at their proper cost and charges, with their own pain and perill made war for the freedom of others: who afforded this favour and pleafure not to the neighbours and bor-" berers only, or to those that were joyned near to them in the continent and firm land, but pas-"fed over the leas; to the end, that throughout the whole world there should be no unjust and r tyrannicall government, but in all places, right, reason, and law, might prevail most and carry egreatest sway Lo, how by the only voice of one Beadle all the Cities of Greece and Asia are set free. To conceive and enterprise so great a thing proceedeth from a brave mind and noble heart: "but to effect the same is a singular vertue and rare felicity.

This done, Quimius and the ten Delegats gave andience to the embaffages of divers Kings and Princes Nations and States. And first of all others were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called in who used the same speech in manner that they had at Rome, vanting great words without any ground and substance of credit. But answer was returned unto them not covertly by way of circumstance as aforetime (when Philip was on foot and things flood doubtfull) but openly in plainterms. Imprimis, That Antiochiu must quit and abandon all the Cities of Asia, which belon- M ged at any time either to King Philip or King Ptolomeus. Item, That he meddle not with any free City or State, and especially with those of Greece: but above all, warned he was and forbidden, either to pass over himself, or to fend any forces into Europe, After the Kings Embassadors were licensed to depart, all the nations and states had a generall session and meeting together, which was the sooner dispatched, for that in the decrees of the ten Delegats all the Cities and States were pronounced by name. Unto the Orestians (a people in Macedony) for that they revolted first from the King, their own lands and priviledges were restored. The Magnesians, the Perthabians and Dolopians were likewise declared free. Unto the people of The faly over and above the grant of their liberty, the Phthiotian Achaens were annexed, excepting the City of Theber in Phebiaand Pharfalus. As for the Ætolians who required, that according to covenant Pharfalus N and Leneas should be rendred unto them, they were put over unto the Senat. But they awarded them the Phocenies and Locrenies, with other appurtenances adjoyred before by verme of the decree Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea (which also is a City of Peloponnesus) were rendred unto the Achains, Moreover, these ten Delegats gave Oreum and Eretria unto Eumenes the son of Attalus but by rea on that Quintius would not agree thereto, the matter was referred over to the Senat for to be decided : and the Senat granted freedom unto thele Cities, together with Cariffus. Unto Plearatus were freely given Lingus and Parthenius, which were two nations in * Illricum, and had been both hibject to Philip. It was ordained also, that Aminender should hold those Castles still, which during the wars he had won from Philip. When the assembly was dissolved, the sen Delegats having divided between themselves their severall charges, departed every man to O fet free the Cities of their particular regions and quarters, P. Lentulusto Bargylla; L. Stertinist to Hophaftra. Thaffus, and other Cities of Thracia; P. Villius and L. Terentius toward King Antiochus; and Cn. Cornelus toward Philip. Unto whom after Cornelius had declared his Commission con erning tome final er matters, and withall demanded of him, Whether he could with patience abide to hear counsell not only profitable unto himself, but also necessary? The King made answer again and fald, That he would not only give him the hearing, but also yield him thanks besides.

A in case he would deliver ought unto him for his good. Whereupon he perswaded him earnestly, that forasmuch as he had obtained peace already, he should send his Embassadors to Rome, to crave league also and amity: to the end, that if Antiochus began to stir, he might not be thought to have attended and waited for some occasions and opportunities to make war. [This conference and communication with Philip was at Tempe in The flay.] And when he answered, That he would immediatly dispatch his Embassadors. Cornelius came to Thermopyla, where a solemn Diet and asfembly of all Greece is wont to be held upon certain fet daies, and thither refort great numbers of people. Which meeting is called Pylaicum: where he advised the Ætolians especially to persever constant and faithfull in the amity of the people of Rome, Some of the principall Ætolians seemed to complain between whiles, that the Romans were not so well affected to their nation after vi-R ctory, as they were in time of the war: but others, more sharply blamed and reproached them. yea, and upbraided them with this, That Philip could not have been vanquished no nor the Romans ever able fo much as to pass over into Greece, without the help of the Etolians. Cornelius forbare to make answer again to those points, for fear of farther wrangling and altercation; and promifed, that if they fent to Rome they should obtain any thing that was reason. Whereupon by his advice and approbation there were deputed Embaffadors. This was the iffue and end of the Whiles these affairs thus passed in Greece, Macedony, and Asa, all Tuscan in manner was gone ont and rifen up in arms, by occasion of a conspiracy of bondslaves. For to enquire into these troubles and to represe the same, there was sent M. Acilius a Prator (who had the civill jurisdiction C between Citizens and aliens) with one of the two legions of Roman Citizens, Some of them, who were already affembled together and grown to an head, he overcame in fight: of whom many were flain, and many taken prisoners. Others he scourged and round trusted up, hanging them on gybbets, even as many as were the principall and chief of the conspiracy : and others there were whom he fent home again to their Masters.

Now the Confuls were gone into their Provinces. Marcellus fo foon as he was entred into the marches of the Bois, and had over-wearied his fouldiers with marching all day long, fate him down upon a certain rifing of a hill, and there as he was encamping himself and his men, Corolamus a Prince or great Lord of the Boil, with a mighty power affailed and charged him, and flew upon three thousand of his men. In which sudden and tumultuary skirmish, certain brave men D of mark were flain; among whom were T. Sempronius Gracchus, and M. Junius Syllanus two Colonels of the allies: also A. Ogulmus and P. Claudius two Knight Marshals or Tribunes of the second legion. Howbeit the Romans strongly sortified their tents and desended them valiantly, which the enemies upon their fortunat victory had long affailed to no effect. And in the same standing camp he continued certain daies, whiles he cured his fouldiers of their wounds, and recovered their hearts after to great a fright. The Boil (as they are a nation that of all things cannot endure any tedious delay of time) dispersed themselves into their towns and forts. Then Marcellus presently crossed the Po, and led his army into the territory of Comunn, where the Insubrians lay encamped after they had follicited and caused those of * Comum to take arms. The legions * Come. made no more ado, but gave them battell in the very way: and at the first encounter the enemies E charged them so hotly, that they forced the forefront of the battell to give ground, Which when Marcellus perceived, fearing lest being once discovered they should be repulsed and discomfitted, he made a cohort of Massians to make head; and at once set forth all the troops of the Latine Cavalry against them. Their first and second charge both, mightily impeached and quailed the enemy, advancing forward luftily and preffing upon them in great fury: whereby the rest of the Roman army taking heart again and being encouraged, at the first received them manfully and made refistance only, but afterwards followed fiercely upon them: insomuch as the Gauls were able no longer to abide their violence, but turned their backs, took them to their heels, and ran away by heaps, Valerius Antias writeth, that in this battell there were forty thouland men flain and above, five hundred and seven military ensigns taken, with 432 chariots: besides many chains Forgold, whereof Claudius presented one (very massie above the rest and of great weight) unto Japper, which was hung up within the Temple in the Capitoll, as he writeth. The fame day was the Camp of the Gauls forced and ranfackt, and the town of Comum allo within few daies taken by affault. Upon this there were eight and twenty boroughs or forts that fell away and revolted to the Conful. But the Historiographers agree not upon this, Whether the Conful led his forces against the Insubrians first, or the Boians; and whether he rased out the dishonour of a former foil and defeat by a fortunate victory in this battell: or contrariwife, after a prosperous fight atchieved before Comum, he blotted and defaced the same with a shamefull overthrow received at

During this variable and alternative fortune, L. Purpurio the other Conful, marched into G the Boians Country through the tribe Sappinia. And when he was approached near to a Castle called * Musilum, he feared left he should be enclosed and intercepted by the Boians and Ligu- * Musiling. rians: whereupon herefired with his forces the same way that he came, and fetching a great com- Blando, Medipals about through the open country in lafety and security, he came at length to his Collegue, and Leandro. Who having joyned both their powers together, first ranged over the Boians territories, wafing and spoiling untill they came as far as * Felfina. up in arms to pill and spoil, and were at that time retired unto the forrests and glins out of the H way. After this the army marched toward the Ligurians. The Boians making full account to affail the Roman army at unawares, which marched without good regard of themselves, and not close together (for that their enemies feemed to be far off) followed after through the blind and covert forreits. But when they faw that they could not overtake them, they fuddenly all at once parsed over the Po in small bothoms and punts, and after they had spoiled and pilled the Levians and Libuans, as they returned from thence with a booty railed out of the country, they chanced in the utmost frontires of Liguria, to light upon the army of the Romans in their march. Sooner and with more eagernels fell they to fight, than if they had appointed both time and place, and been prepared aforehand to firike a battell. There it well appeared, of what force anger is to prick on and sharpen mensipirits to conflict. For the Romans more greedy of murder and bloudshed, t than of victory, fought fo, as they scarce left the enemies one messenger to carry the news of their unhappy overthrow, In regard of these exploits, upon the Consuls letters brought to Rome, ordained it was, that there should be a solemn procession and thanksgiving to the gods for three daies. Shortly after Marcellus came to Rome, unto whom was granted a triumph with great confent of the LL, of the Senar; and whiles he was in his Magistracy he triumphed over the Insubrians and Comians, leaving for his Collegue good hope likewise of a triumph, because himself (to sava truth Jin that nation fought but unfortunately, whereas his Collegue fred well enough, and had a lucky hand, Much spoil of the enemies was carried in a pomp, upon the Chariots that were taken and won from them. Many enfigns and banners were born in a flew, befides in money to the value of 320000 affes of braiscoin; and 234000 bigate peeces of filver. The footmen had 800 affes it given them apeece, every horseman and centurion had thrice as much. The same year King Antiochus, whiles he kept his winter at Ephesus, assaied to reduce all the

that the rest would not be hard to be subdued and brought under, because the towns were either fituate upon plains, or nothing well fortified with walls, and not furnished with men and munition, As for * Smyrna and * Lamp facus, they stood upon their freedom, and challenged it, Doubted it was, and great danger, that if he should let them go clear away so, some Cities in Folis and Ionia would take alter Smyrna, and others in Hellespontus follow the example of Lampfacus. Therefore both himfelf fent from " Ephefus to lay fiege unto Smyrna, and gave commandment, That the forces which were at Abrdus (leaving only a small garrison behind) should be lead to L the fiege and affault of Lampfacus. And yet he threatned and terrified them not fo much with forces and violence, but affaied them rather by fair means, fending to them his Embaffadors, to as, partly by flattering and gentle words wherewith he entertained them, and partly by mild reproof for their rashness and obstinacy, he endeavoured to put them in some hope, that shortly they should have what soeyer they defired: and then, both they themselves, and all others should evidently fee, that they had obtained their liberty by the especiall grace and favour of the King, and not uturped and gained it by occasion of forme advantage and opportunity. To this they answered again, That Aniochas ought neither to marvell, nor be offended and displeased at them if time. Then he departing from Ephefus in the beginning of the spring salled unto Hells pomms with M his sleet. His land forces he transported over to "Madytos a City in Chersonnessus, and joyned them to his strength by sea. And because they shut the gates upon him, he environed the town with armed men, and when he was at the point to give the affault, and to bend his engins of battery against the walls it was surrendred into his hands. Upon the like fear the Inhabitants also of other Cities in Chersonnesus yielded themselves. After this he came to * Lysimachia with his whole power, as well of land-fouldiers as fea-fervitors. And finding it abandoned, ruinat, and lying f as it were) along, (for but few years before the Thracians had forced, facked, and burnt it) he had a caftre, Nardo. great defire to rear and fet upright again that noble and famous City, seated in so good and commodious a place. And therefore he took great care, and employed all his endeavour to re-edifie the walls, to re-build the edifices, to redeem and ranfom the Lysimachians that were in slave- N ry, to feek out all those that were dispersed over Hellespontus and Chersonnesus, and gather them together, yea, and to enroll new inhabitants upon hope of gain and profit, and by all means possible to store and people the City again. And withall, because he would ease them of the sear they had of the Thracians, he went inperson with the one half of his land-forces to waste and spoil the confines of Thrace; the other part with all the fea-fouldiers and mariners he left hard at work

they could not wel endure the hope which they had of freedom thus to be deferred from time to about the repairing of the City. About this time as L. Cornelius (being fent by the Senat to compose the controversies and variance between the two Kings Antiochus and Ptolomeus) abode at Selymbria; so of the ten Commillioners abovefaid, P. Lentulus departed from Bargylla, P. Villius and L. Terentius from Thaffus, and arrived all three at Lysimachia: where L, Cornelius likewise met them from Selymbria; and O a few daies after King Antiochus being newly returned out of Thracia. The first meeting and falutation between him and the Commissioners was friendly and courteons, yea, and there passed to and fro afterwards divers amiable kindnesses and loving entertainments mutually. But when they entred once to parl of their Commission that they had in charge, and of the present State of Asia, then there was fretting and fuming and their bloud up. The Roman Agents fluck not to tell him to his face that all that he had done, since he took the sea, and departed with his fleet out of Syria

A was displeasant unto the Senat, saying, "That they thought it meet, that all the Cities should be " reftored unto King Ptolomeus, which had been under his dominion. For as touching those "towns, which sometime Philip had been possessed of, and which Antiochus had surprized and "feized upon, taking his time and vantage, when Philip was employed another way in the Ro-" man wars, it was no reason, nor a thing tolerable, that the Romans should for so many years "foace.by land and sea endure so great toil, and hazard such perils; and suffer Antiochus in the end to go away with the fruit and reward of all the service. But set the case that the Romans would "take no knowledge of his coming into Asia, as a matter impertinent unto them; can they dif-"femble also, that now he is come over into Europe with all his forces both for land and lea, and "little wanteth of making open war upon the Romans? Mary, as for him, he will not let to deny B " that he levieth any war, although he were arrived and landed in Italy. To these challenges the "King madeanswer, and said, That he saw well enough and knew before that the Romans were " inquisitive and curious enough to search what King Antochus ought to do, but they never once " thought of their own felves, how far forth they should by right proceed, as well by land as by "fea. As for Asia, it appertained not at all to the people of Rome, neither had they more reason to "enquire what Antiochus did in Asia, than Antiochus to search into the actions of the people of " Rome in Italy, As concerning Ptolomeus, from whom they complain, that he had taken certain Cicc ties; he did them to understand, that there was amity between him and Ptolomeus, and they were " now in terms of knitting themselves shortly in nearer bonds of alliance and affinity. Neither "fought he the spoil of Philip, and to enrich himself by his adversity and missortane : or passed o-C 'ver into Europe against the Romans * * * * But when he was vanquished once, all that e- Somewhat " ver he had, by right and law of war, became the possession of Schurus; and to consequently a wanting in the therook it) appetrained much him. And during the time that his propagators and produced status. "hetook it) appertained unto him. And during the time, that his progenitors and predeceffors, "were bushed and troubled with other affairs, first Protome seatched at some things, and Philip
"after at other, and so between them they usurped and seized upon other mens possessions, and "namely, of certain places near and hard by in Thacia, which without all controverse belonged "unto Lysimachus. Forto reduce which into their ancient State, he was thither come, and now "was in hand to re-edifie Lysimachia anew, lately destroyed by the violence of the Thracians, to "the end, that Seleucus his fon might hold it as the royall feat of his kingdom. Thus as they continued arguing and debating for certain daies, there ran a rumor, but without any certain author,

D that King Ptolomeus was dead: whereupon they could grow to no conclusion of all their parlies: yet they made semblance on both sides, that they heard nothing thereof. And as well L. Cornelius. who was fent in Embassage to both the Kings, Antiochus and Prolomeus, requested respite of some small time to confer with Ptolomeus, to the end that himself might be arrived in Egypt before any alteration were made in the new possession of that kingdom: as also Antiochus made reckoning, that Agypt would be his, if this good occasion then were presented unto him. Therefore having dismissed the Romans, and left his son Selencus behind him with all the land-forces, for to finish the building again of Lysimachia which he had begun, himself with all his fleet failed to Ephelus: and having fent his Embassadors to Quintius to treat loberly about a league and amity, he coasted along Asia and so arrived in * Lycia, And when he heard for certain at * Patara that Profomeus was * Britania, Gi E yet living, he gave over his purpole of sailing into Egypt: yet nevertheless he shaped his course & rave. fet failtor Cyprus: and when he had doubled the point of Chelidonium, he staid awhile in "Pam- * Patera. phylia about the river * Eurymedon, by occasion of a mutiny among the mariners & oar-men, From of the North thence he weighed anchor, and when he was failed as far as a place called . The heads of the river part is called *Sarus] there arole a gust and fearful tempest, wherein he had like to have been cast away and Caraman, and drowned with all his fleet. Many of his ships were run aground, & many of them swallowed up of the reft scandodrowned with all his fleet. Many of his fhips were run aground, or many or tuem i wantowed up of the fea, for a sthere establed not one of them by swimming to land. A number of men there perished, "Austin, The Chinary of the feather and fertile fland." "Austin, The not of base mariners only, and unknown common souldiers, but also of his near and special friends, ye o. Having rallied the disperied reliques of this shipwrack, seeing he had no means and was not able . Sangro, to reach and gain Cyprus, he returned again to Seleucia, with an army nothing so puissant nor so F well furnished, as when he set out in his voyage. There he commanded his thips to be haled aland, and laid up in their docks (for winter now approached) & himself took his journey to * An- * Antiochia, tiochia, there to lye all that winter time, And in these terms stood the affairs of the Kings. At Rome, there were first instituted in this year three Triumvirs called Epulones, to wit, C. Lici-nius Lucullus, T. Romuleius (who was the man that put up the bill for their creation) and P.Porcius Lecca, And by a law in that behalf ordained, these Triumvirs were allowed as welse a Bishop, the long embrodered robe of purple. But inthis year great debate & variance there was between the Questors or Treasurers of the City Q. Fabius Labeo, & L. Aurelius of the one side, and all the Priests on the other side. These treasurers were at some fault for mony, because they were minded and appointed to make the last payment unto certain privat persons, for the loan-filver which G they had disburfed for the wars: these monies the Treasurers demanded of the Augurs and Bishops, to furnish out the said paiment; for that during the wars, they only had not been contributers in any levy. The Priests appealed to the Tribunes, and called for their lawfull favour : but all was in vain, and so they were forced to satisfie all the arrerages for the years past, wherein they had paid nothing. This year there died two Bishops, and new were installed in their rooms. M. Marcellusthe Conful entred in place of T. Sempronius Tuditanus, who deceased Przetor in Spain; and L.Valerius instead of M. The same day that L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius entred their office, they proposed unto the Sent concerning the government of the Provinces. And order was given by the LL. of the Councill, that for a fmuch as the war increased so in Spain, as required not only a Consular army, but a Conful also for the Leader; the Confuls should either agree between themselves for the government of the two Provinces, to wit, the hither Spain, and Italy, or else to cast lots therefore: K that he whose hap it was to rule Spain, should have with him two legions, five thouland Latine allies, and five hundred horse; and likewise to have the conduct of a seet of twenty gallies of war: that the other Conful should levy and enroll two legions; which were thought sufficient to defend and keep France in obedience, confidering the courages of the Infubrians and Boii, were well cooled and abated the last year. Cato by lot had the charge of Spain, and Valerius of Italy. Then the Prators calt lots for their Provinces. To C. Fabricius Lufcinns iell the juridiction over the Citizens of Rome: to C. Atinius Labeo over the Arangers. C. Manlius Voljo governed Sicily, and Ap. Claudius Nero the farther Spain, M. Porcius Lecca was assigned to rule Pifa, to theend he might be upon the back of the Ligurians, and P. Manlius was appointed as an affittant and coadjutor to the Consul in the higher Spain. As for T. Quintius, his Commission was renewed for L one year longer, in regard that not only Antiochus and the Etolians, but also Nabu the Lecedamonian Tyrant, were doubted and suspected not to stand sound to the Romans; and for him were fer our two legions: and if need were of any supply to make up the companies thereof, the Confuls were enjoyned to enroll new fouldiers, and to fend them over into Macedony. Alfo Appins Claudius had a warrant to take up 2000 loot, and two hundred horse, over and above that legion which Q. Fabins had. The like number of fresh horse and foot was appointed for P. Manlins to be fent into the higher Spain: and the fame legion was granted unto him, which was commanded by Minutins the Prater. Moreover, P. Porcius Lecca was to have the leading of two hundred footmen, and fifty horse, drawn out of the Gaulsarmy, for to lie in Hetruria about Pile Last of all in Sardina P. Sempronius Longus continued fill in place of command. Thus the Provinces M being distributed, the Confuls before they departed out of the City, by advice and counsell of the Bishops performed the solemnity of the facred Spring which was vowed beforeby the Prator C. Cornelius Mammula, according to the mind of the Senat and the good liking of the people, in the year when Cn. Servilius and Cn. Flaminius were Consuls : and so it was celebrated one and twenty years after it was first vowed. Much about this time was C. Claudius Pulcher, the son of Appins, elected Augur, and invested in that Sacerdotall dignity, in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, who died the year before.

When as men began now to marvell that there was so little account made of the war began already in Spain, there were letters brought from Q. Minatius with news, That he had fought a fortimate field before the town of Turba, with Budares and Befasides, two Spanish Generals and great N commanders: that he had slain twelve thousand enemites, taken Budares the General himself prifoner and that the rest were discomstred and put to slight. Upon the reading of these letters, less fear there was of Spain, from whence they looked for great wars.

After the return of the ten Delegats or Commissioners abovesaid, all the care was, and no talk else but about Antiochus and his affairs. These men, after they had declared fish how no talk else but about Antiochus and his affairs. These men, after they had granted peace, their proceeding went with King Philip, and upon what conditions they had granted peace, their proceeding went with King Philip, and upon what conditions they had granted peace, this they had granted peace, the historia of the proceeding the proceeding the historia of the peace with a mighty Armado, and as putisar an army that he had passed on the early a vain hope to invade and size of upon Egypt, which he conceived of a vainer bruit and rumor of Ptolomy his death all Greece of upon Egypt, which he conceived of a vainer bruit and rumor of Ptolomy his death all Greece of upon Egypt, which he conceived of a vainer bruit and rumor of Ptolomy his death all Greece of the naturally of an unquiet spirit, and incensed besides against the Romans, would not have off till and been in rest. Moreover, there was another malady and mischief as dangerous, selde of the laced mindians only, but frontly, if he may be let alone, of all Greece; who for avaice of the Laced mindians only, but frontly, if he may be let alone, of all Greece; who for avaice and cruelty is equal to all the samous and noted tyrants that ever were: and if he be suffered to consider the content of the process.

A seposites himself of Argent and to hold it as a fortress to command all Peloponness, when the "Roman armies shall be once transported home again into Italy, infaith, Greece may make "Imall boath of being delivered from Philip; for this they thall be fure of at least; if of nothing "elle to have a near-neighbour tyrant, instead of a King far off, for to be their Lord and imperi-" only to sommand them. The ancient penators, hearing these intelligences from grave persons of good quality,, and who made report of all things not by hearfay, but upon their own knowledge, were of advice and resolved to have a good eye and regard with all speed unto Antiochias, considering the King was passed already into Spria, whatsoever the occasion was. But as touching the Tyrant, after they had disputed and debated the matter long time, Whether they had sufficient cause already to determine upon some small conclusion, or should refer unto the wif-B dome and judgement of T. Quimius the managing of those affairs, therein to proceed and do according ashe should deem it good and expedient for the Common-wealth; in fine, they permitted him to use his own discretion concerning the Lacedamonian Tyrant: supposing that the matter was not of such weight and consequence as to concern the main state of the wealpublike fo matterially, whether it were haffened or protracted; but rather it behoved them to be advised and confider well, what Annibal and the Carthaginians would do, if haply the war with Antiochus were begun and once afoot. They [at Carthage | that fided with the adverse fa-Etion of Annibal, had fent divers and fundry letters unto the principal LL, at Rome, every one privative to his friends to this effect, That there passed messengers and letters from Annibal to Antiochus, and that there were Embassadors again that lecretly came from the King to him. And like C as there be some beatls so wild and savage as never can be tamed; so the courage and spirit of that map was such, as might not possibly be dulced or appealed. For he daily complained that the City languithed and grew feeble with idleness, and by fitting fill and doing nothing, was overgrown as it were with moss, and unpossible it was to raise and stir it up but with sound of armour and weapons. These advertisements carried likelihood of truth and good credit with them, in regard of the late war, so fresh in memory, which he alone began first, and managed to the last. Over and befides, he had provoked by a late act of his, many great and mighty personages, who fer their hearts against him. The order and degree of Judges at that time bare chief sway and foveraign authority in Carthage: in this respect principally, for that the same Judges were perpetuall. The goods, the honour and reputation, yea, and the life of every man lay in their D hands. He that displeased one of that bench, war sure to have all the rest his enemies and to be upon him: and there never wanted one promoter or other to carry tales and give information to thele judges against a man, if they faw them ill affected once and bent against one. During the time of this imperious and tyrannicall rule of theirs, (for as their power was exceeding all measure, fo they bare themselves therein as outragiously beyond the limits of civility) it was Annilal his hap to be Prator; and by vertue of his place he fent for one of the treasurers to come before him: but he made no reckoning of his authority, and refused to obey for the faid treasurer was one of the contrary side; and because from the degrees of those treasurers they mounted presently into the highest order of the Judges, therefore he carried with him an hauty mind already, in regard of the high room that he was shortly to step into. Annibal you may be E fure took this as a great diffrace and indignity to his person, and therefore he sent a purseyant or ser jeans to attach the body of the Treasurer aforesaid: and presently calling the people to a generall affembly, he commanded him there to be presented: where he accused and blamed the party himlelf, no more than the whole order and degree of the Judges: through whole infolent pride and excessive power, both laws and Magistrats were nothing regarded but trodden underfoot. And perceiving that these words of his tickled the itching ears of the people, confidering also that their proud demeanor prejudiced the liberty of the meanest persons : immediatly he published a law, and got it enacted, That those Judged should be chosen every year, and that thenceforth one and the same man might not be a Judge two years together. But look how much thank he had at the Commons hands for this act, fo much he offended many of the great F men and principals of the City. Another thing befides he did, whereby he purchased to himself the ill will of some private persons, in tendring the common good of the weal-publike. The finances and revenues of the State, partly, through negligence went to decay, and partly, were shared out in dividends between some certain of the head Citizens and Magistrats: and more than that, the money which by way of tribute was to be paid yearly unto the Romans, was too short and not to be found: "and it appeared, that a fore levy would be imposed upon private persons thorry to make those payments out of their own purses. Annibal, after he had cast up the books; and made an estimate and just abstract how much the rents and revenues of the City amounted

unio, as well from cultoms by ies as land, and to what ules they were employed; and perceiving thereby what was defrayed in the ordinary charges of the State, and what went a wrong way, and was a well of the every set of the common charge of the whole illembly. That the arrerages fround be garhered up and brought into the common Cheft: and to privat perfors might be dicharged and ealed of their impositions of tribute, and the Common wealth would be rich enough and able to perform and furnish out the monies due to the performance of the common wealth would be rich enough and able to perform and furnish out the monies due to the performance of the common continued to the common of the performance of the common tribute. them great wrong in taking their own goods from them, and not proceeded in publicato wrest to out of their hands their floin fibitance: and in great malice and bitterneis ceased not to provoke against Annibathe Romans, who were ready enough of themselves to pick some quarrellumin. to keek occasion of hatred, and to find ann hole in his coat, Seipio Africarius for a long sune gave the deafear unto them, and milliked the course: for he supposed it was not for the honour and majeffy of the people of Rome to subscribe unto those imputations charged upon Annibal; to entertain the spight and hatred of men, and to interess and insert publike authority within the privat factions of the Carthaginians; and not to be content to have vanquished Annibal in war, unless they also took upon them the persons of accusers, and preferred a slanderous libels & bill of indirement, and sware thereto Billa vera. But at length they wrought and brought about, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage, who in the Senat there might charge Annibal categorically, with plotting and practifug with Antiochus for to wage war against them. And these three were addressed to this Embassie, C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Culles a who being arrived there, caused it to be given out to as many as should demand the cause of their coming, (and all by instruction from the adversaries of Annibal) that their errand was to compose and end the debates between Mafanissa King of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and beleeved for truth. But Annibal found them straight and smelt this jugling, and was not ignorant that he was the only man that the Romans shorat, and howsoever peace was granted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endless and inexpiable war with him alone fill. Whereupon he relolved to frame himself to give place to the time and yield unto fortune. And being furnished aforehand with all things requisit to take his flight, when he had of K purpole all the day long shewed himself in the publike place of assembly very formally, to turn by all suspicion of his intended resolution, to soon as it beganto be dark night, in his Citizens gown as he went alday; and attended in the Hall, he gate him forth straight to the City gate, accompanied only with two perfons, and those not privy at all to his purpose and designment. And having found his hories ready in the place appointed, he mounted and rode apace that night until he was come to a certain quarter of the territory of Voca: and by the next morning, he passed between Acrilla and Thapfus, and recovered a tower or fort of his own; where he was imbarked in a thip ready rigged and appointed with fail and our to take fea and away. Thus departed Annibal out of Affrick, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamity of his country, than of his own friends and kinsfolk. And the same day he fell with the Island Cercina: where the Cartha- It ginians found in the rode certain halks charged with merchandife: and when at his coming ashore out of his ship, there came many running toward him for to salute and welcome him this ther, he charged his own company, that if any asked concerning him, they should make answer. That he went upon an Embassage to Tyrm : but fearing left any of their barks should disanchor that night, and make report at Thaplus or Acylla that he wasfeen in Cercina: he caused a beaft to be killed for factifice, and invited the Mafters of the ships and all the Merchants to supper; and therewith commanded all the fails and crois fail-yards to be had out of the veffels to make thereof a large pavillion, that they might fit in the shade at their supper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midiummer. And as the time and fuch provision as they had, would give leave, he fet out a feaft and banker; he spared for no wine, and continued the mertiment far within night. Then M Annibal, so soon as he could espy his time for to deceive those that were in the harbor, weighed anchor. The rest were fast afleen; and when the next day they awoke and rouzed themselves with their drunken and drouzy nols (and far forth day it was, and late ere they arose) they were fain to found fome hours in fitting their oars again in their right places, and the tackling of the ships in

In this while, at Carthage the ordinary multitude that used to frequent the house of Annibal, repaired as their manner was to his gate-house: and when it was voiced abroad, that he was not to be found, all the company gathered together in the market place, feeking and euquiring for the principall and chief personage of their City, Some gave out (as the truth was) that he was fled : other faid plainly, that he was murdered and made away through the fallhood and villary of the N Romans; and this they picked not to avouch. There might a man have seen fundry and divers countenances (as it faret in commonly in Cities where there is fiding and parts-taking) as each one is affected to his own party and faction. At last, news came that he was seen at Cercina, The Roman Embassadors having upon audience given, declared in the Senat of Carthage, that the LL of their Senat had centain intelligence, that both aforetime, King Philip was by Annibal especially sol licited and fet on to make war with the people of Rome; and also now there hath been letters and messengers with credence sent from him to King Antiochus; and that he would never rest untill he had fet all the world together in arms: and therefore if the Carthaginians were defirous to content and fatisfie the Romans, they should not suffer these parts of his to escape unpunished: then the Carthaginians made answer, and faid, That nothing of all this passed by publike council O or consent or allowance of the State, howbeit they would be willing to do what dever the Ro-

And at Ephelia overtook the Kings, whom he sound floating and wavering still in this imited, and unfellived what to do as touching the Roman war. But this coming of Amibal, was no small police to turn the ballance, and to move him to enter into the enterprise thereof. The Etolians likewise at the same time were estranged and alienated in affection from the Roman league and society, whose Embassack demanding to have Phar/alum and Leacas again, with orted to Quinting.

He law Oppia populaded and enasted by C. Oppius a Tribun of the Common, in the time of the Panich war, for the abridging and restraint of the excess in womens apparel, was after much variance and debate repealed, not with franding that Porcius Cato laboured to the contrary, that it might not the abolified. This Cato made a vorage into Spain, and by force of arms (beginning first to war at Emporta) brought the hither province of Spain on this side lberus to quietness. T. Quintius Flamininus levied war against the Lacedemonians and Nabis their tyrant, in which he spead forinnally, and so preoxiled, that he made an end thereof, granted them peace to his own good liking and pleasare, delivered Argos, and f t st free, which was before in subjection to the trant. The Senatahen, and rever before, bebill the public games and passimes by themselves, apart from the rest of the peopl . Which to bring about Sex Alius Pretus, and L. Cornelius Cethegus the Cenfors, fet in foot and intermedled themselves, to the great ind gnation and discontentment of the Commons, More colonies were planted with Roman citizens, M. Porcius Cato triumphed over Spain. The wars also which fortunarly were atchieved against the Boil and the French Infubres are here recorded. T. Quintius Flaminimus, who had vanguifted Philip King of the Macedonians and Nabisthetyrant of the Lacedemonians, yea, and freed all Gree e from their oppression, for these many and noble exploits, rode intriumph three daies together. The Carthaginian Embafadors brought word, that Annibal who was fled unto Antiochus, banded with him and combined to make war. Annibal had befodes affined by means of one Atisto a Tyrian fent as a convier with credence only and no letters, to Carthage) for to move and sollicite the Carthaginians

Esween the troublesome cares of great wars, which either were not fully ended, or at Erween the troubletome cares or great wars. Which in it felf being but a finall mar-hand ready to begin, there happed an occurred e, which in it felf being but a finall marter to speak of, and of little regard a confidering the fides and part-taking about it, grew to a mighty head and contention in the end. M. Fundanius and L. Valerius Tribuns of the Commons, preferred a bill unto the people touching the abrogation of the Law Oppia. For C. Opparafortime, even when the Punick war was at the hottest, and whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempromus were Confuls, had promulged a Statute, by vertue whereof, No woman of what degree fo-Syst might either have in Ornaments and Jewels above half an onnce weight of gold, nor wear any habiliments wrought of fundry colours, nor yet ride in Coach within the City of Rome, or any other Town nor neerer than a mile from thence unless it were upon occasion of some solemn icall or publick facelifice. Now M. Janius Brutus, and P. Junius Brutus, both Tribuns likewise of the Commons, flood in defence and maintenance of the faid law Oppia, and affirmed plainly they yould not fuffer it to be anulled. Many a nobleman was seen in this quarrel: some spake for the Liv, and others gain-aid it. The Capitol was full of people, either taking part and favouring the saute, or else opposing themselves, and orging the contrary. The very dames of the City themgives could neither by periwation and advice, nor by any reverent and womanly regard, nor yet by the express and absolute commandment of their busbands be kept within dores; but do what they could they beforead all the fireets of the City, befor and kept all the waies into the common C place, befeething and entreating their husbands as they pasted by and went down thither to permigand give their confent, That feeing the good effate of the Common-weal now flourished and the private wealth of every manencreased daily, their wives also and mattons might be al-Jowed to have their ancient ornaments and gay attire again. The number of these women grew erery daysmore then other for now they flocked also out of the Towns, Villages, and other places of telest in the country and theyed themselves at Rome. In so much, as they took heart at lengths and were to bold as to encounter the Confuls, the Pretors, and other Magittrats, requesting and inlis, Marcu Porcius Cato by name, they could not with all their praiers entreat him to encline aunto their fuit: who in the maintenance of the laid law, and that it might not be revoked, spake im The Oration the frequent affembly of the people to this effect. "My Masters and citizens of Rome, Hevery of M. Portion " one of us had fully refolved and purposed with himself to hold his own, and keep the rightful Cato, in main- 46 authority and preheminence that he hath over his own wife, lefs ado and trouble we should tenance of the share had with them all together at this day. Now having given them the head at home for "much, that the curitness and shrewdness of women bath conquered our liberty and freehold "there; behold, here also in publick place it is troden down and trampled underfoot: and because we were not able every man to rule his own in several, now we stand in sear and dread "them all in general. Certainly, I my felf thought ever until now, that it was but a feined fable. " and devised sale that went of a certain " Island, wherein by a conspiracy of women, all the men " were murdered every one, and that iex utterly made away and rooted out. But well I see now, " be they creatures never fo weak, fo filly and teeble, let them once have their meetings, their conventicles and fecret conferences, they will work mischief in the highest degree, and be as dangerous as any other. And turely for mine own part, I cannot relolve in mine own confcience "and determine, whether of the twain be worfe; the thing I mean in it felf, or the precedent ex-"amp'e and confequence thereof, confidering the manner how it is handled. Of which two, the one toucheth us that are Confuls and the rest of the magistrats the other concerneth you rather "my masters and citizens of Rome. As for the matter in question, and proposed unto you, whe-"ther it be good and expedient for the weal-publick or no, that refleth in you to determine and "judge, who are to give your voices and suffrages. But this seditions insurrection here, of wo-"men be it of themselves, or procured by your motion and instigation, M. Fundanius & L. Valeri-" m,no doubt it argueth and implieth a great default in the Magilirate, and I wot not whether it " will be a fouler blot and dishonour to you that are Tribuns, than to us Consuls. Yours will the "blame be if ye have brought women now to raite and fiir up tribunitious feditions; and ours "the shame if we needs must admit and accept of laws, whether we will or no for fear of a com-"motion and separation of our women, as sometimes we were forced to do by the departure and " infurrection of our Commons, Lasture you for mine own self, when I passed erewhile into this "common-place through the press and throng of these women, I was abashed &could not thuse "but blush. And had I not been more respective of the reputation, the honour and reverence of " fome in particular than of them all together, because it should not be thought & faid, that they "had been checked and taken up by the Coniul; I would have faid unto them, What new fashion "is this good wives, to run gadding abroad into the open streets, to beset the passages, and to af-"front, yea, and hang upon other womens husbands as ye do? What? could ye not every one at "home have dealt with your own good-men in the caule, and craved their help? or can ye speak " fair and flatter better, can ye be more pleasant and affable abroad in the Town, than within your " houses? or make love to other men, rather then to your own husbands? And yet to speak uper rightly, if wives were of that modelly and womanly carriage, as to keep themselves within the " compais and bounds of their own liberty, and pais no farther; it were not befitting you I wot, fo "much as at home to trouble your selves about our laws here, nor to busy your brains, to know "either what new Statuts passed or what old were cassed. Our ancestors in old time would not, M "that women in any wife should dispose so much as of their own privat matters without the ad-"vice and direction of a Governor and Overseer: and therefore in great wisedom they ordained, "that they should be ordred and ruled, by their parents, by their brethren, by their husbands. But "we (and God will)can abide them to intermeddle in state-matters, to govern the weal-publick, "to conver'e with us in the common place, in publick affemblies and courts of parliament. For " what elie do they now in the threets, in the crofs waies & at all I avenues, but, some of them give "their voyces that the bills of the Tribuns may pais and others advise and be of opinion that the - "law Oppia may be repealed? Let this outrageous & unreasonable nature of theirs have the head; "let theie unruly creatures and untamed animals have their will and bridle them notifiethen how N

" of themselves they will keep a mean and measure in their licentionsnes, unless you curb them & N " hold them in. Tush this is the least matter of all that displeaseth these women there are a 1000 "things besides that they think hardly of, and are discontented to be held unto by old customes "and positive laws, Liberty in all things; nay to speak more truly, a loose and dissolute licenticul-"nes, is the very thing they long after and defire. For go they away cleer with this once, what is "it that they will not attempt and give the venture for? Do but run through and count the laws "provided in this behalffor women, whereby our fore-fathers and predecessors have kept down "and restained their disorderly appetites, and with which they have sought to subject them to "their husbands: yet, hardly can ye with the help of them all, keep them in awe and tied faft, but " break out they will and have their own waies. What then? how and if ye fuffer them to catch " this and that and t'other thing to it if I fay, ye let them wrest from you one thing after another, O 46 until at length they be check-mares with their husbands, think ye that ever you shall be able to 44 Supportance and ure them? Begin they once to be equals they will soon be superiours make them " your fellows, and fireight-wayes they willbe your masters. But alas, we lay too hardly totheir " charge. The thing that they fland upon is no more but this, That no new Act and flature pals of against them e for no equal and reasonable thing do they refuse: their defire and prayer is only

" that they might not be wronged. No no, it is clean contrary: That law which ye have received " and admitted, that which by your fuffrages you first granted, that which by the practice and ex-" perience of fo many years you have allowed and approved, they would have you to revoke and s, abolifin: which is as much to fay, as by anulling that one, to infringe, impair, and diminish the " authority and vertue of the reft. No law is there so well devised, that is goods commodious and " agreeable unto ail. This only is intended principally to be confidered, that it may be profitable to the most part, and serve in general. For it as each person shall find an act prejudicial, hurtful, " and offentive to himfelf, he may be allowed by and by to undo and demolish the same to what " end should all the people assemble together to the making of those statutes, which they amon a-" gainst whom they were enacted may abolish & overthrow? But gladly would I know the great B " occasion and caule, for which our dames in such trouble and uprore run out into the fireets, and " have much ado to forbear the common place, and to mount up into the Roftra to make an ora-" tion to this audience? Is it forthis, to redeem out of the hands of Annibal, their fathers, their "husbands, their children and brethren, whom he keepeth prisoners? Nay, that calamity is far enough off at this day, and far may it ever be I pray God from our City and Common-weal. And « yet when the time was of that hard fortune and calamity, you would not hearken to their pite-" ous and kind prayers in that behalf. But it may well be, that it is neither natural love and kind " affection, nor careful regard of their deer friends, but meer rouch of confcience and fense of reli-" gion that hath brought them thus together in a congregation. And ready they are, it may be, to e receive and intertain dame Cybele or Idaa, coming from Pessimus out of Phrygus. What honest C colour and shew, so much as in word only can be pretended to bear out and cover this muti-Grous fedition of women? Mary this (fay they) that we may glitter in our golden jewels, and " shine in purple robes to be seen a far off: that as well on work daies as holy-dayes, we may be efet up and ride in our coaches and chariots through the City, as it were in triumph, for the con-" quest and victory of a law by us repealed and disanulled: for winning from you, and wringing out « of your hands, maugre your beards, the liberty of your voices and suffrages: to the end that we « might not be stinted and gaged in our excessive expenses, in our dissolute protition, in costly va-« nities and superfluities. Many a time ye have heard me complain of the wastful and sumptuous " bravery of women: and as often have you known me to inveigh against the lavish spending of es men, not privat persons only, but magistrats also in higher place: and how this City of ours is fick D as it were at one time of two contrary diseases and maladies, to wit pinching avarice, and supera fluons prodigality, two plagues I say, that have been the bane and overthrow of all great Moa narchies and flourishing empires. These pestilent mischiess I dread so much the more, as our « flate and common-weal encreafeth to the better; groweth wealthy every day more than other; et and as our dominion extendeth still farther and farther. And now that we are gotten over into as Greece and Asia, provinces full of all entiting pleasures and alluring delights of the world, now ce that we are come to finger and handle the rich treasures of mighty Monarchs, I fear me that even « these things have rather captivated us, than we them. The goodly images, statues and pictures ce that came from Syracufa are (trust me truly) dangerous to this City, and threaten no less than so " many enfigns of the field displayed against it. And I hear say already, that there are many, and E a too too many, that praise and have in admiration the beautiful ornaments of Corinth & Athens, and begin to make a scorn and game of the images of the Roman Gods made of potters earth at only, laughing much at them, where they fee them standing forth of the walls. Well, for my part « I had rather have these gods so propice and savorable to us as they be than such as those and so «I hope they will ever be, if we can suffer them to abide still in their usual shrines and places ac-«cultomed. No longer ago than in our fathers daies, King Pyrrhus lent his Embassador Cyneas of a purpole, and affaied by rich and goodly gifts, to tempt the minds not only of our men, but also of ct our women. There was no law Oppia as then in force to bridle and keep down the costly pomp a and bravery of women: and yet not one of them all received ought at his hands. And what think ce ye was the cause? even the same and no other, for which our ancestors in times past, never so et much as thought upon the providing of any such law. There was no pride then, nor riotous sua perfluity to restrain. And like as the skill and knowledge of diseases, must pracede and go afore as their cures and remedies: even so evil desires and enormous lusts had need to bud forth & spring e before the laws, which should repress and cut them down. What caused the law Licinia to be es made, concerning 500 acres of ground, forbidding that no man should possess above, but the « exceeding coverousnes of men, encroaching Hill and laying land to land? What brought in the ce law Cincia, as touching gifts and presents, but this, that the Commons began already to be vassals as it were and tributaries to the Senat. No marvail therefore it is, nor firange may it feem, that ca neither the law Oppia, nor any other providing for the cutting off the unmeasurable expences of a women, was required and thought needful in those daies: when gold, when purple freely tendred G , and of dunto them was refused. If now at this day Cynew were come, and went with such as gifts round about in the City, he should find receivers enough of women, standing in every street " ready for him. And verily, with all the wit I have, I can not devile what the cause and reason choold be of many infful defires and appetites that reign in this age. For fay, that if one of you g. Were kept short and debarred of that, which another might lawfully have: peradventure there « might rile in your hearts (through infirmity) some shame and abasiment in nature, or elfe dife pleasage and discontenument in reason: so being all as ye are brought within one compass of fur" niture and apparel, and no cds at all between you, what need any one of you to fear, left the H fhould be looked into, marked or observed, more than another. I must needs say, the shame that " followeth & attendeth either upon nigardite or poverty, is worft of all others: but the law quitteth and freeth you of both, when you want but that only which by law ye may not have and no man wil reproach you therfore. Yes mary, quoth some rich and wealthy dame, this same e-" quality and no diffinction at al among us of althings I cannot abide: Why may not I according to my calling, be feen araied in purple, and adorned with gold? And why is not the pocrestate of others known, but lieth hidden under this pretext & cloak of a law: fo as they may be thought " yet (were it not for the law) that such and such things they would have; where as indeed they "are not able to maintain and beat it out? Would ye(in faith) my mafters and citizens of Rome. have your wives to firive thus, that the richer fort might deterve to have that, which no other I can reach unto : and the poor again, because by that means they would not be despiled, over-" firein themielves to go above their calling and abinity? Certainly I dare avow, if they begin once " to shame at that which is not shame-worthy, they will not abash at any thing, be it never so 66 hameful Have it the will out of her own, to long as it latteth; and when all is gone, to her hus-66 bands purie she will go. Alas poor man and wo begun is that husband; as wel he that is intrea-"ted by his wife, to firetch his purfe firings, as he that is not, when he shal see another manto give "her that, which he would not allow himself, And even now ye see how openly in the street sun-" fhame-faced as they be they are in hand with other womens husbands, yea, & that which more is, they keep an increating for to cals the law & for the favour of their voices only. For of tome "they have got the good wills no doubt already, whiles themselves wil not be intreated, but draw K " milery upon thee upon thy state, and upon thy children. Wel, let the law once cease to set down "a gage and proportion of thy wives expenses, and never think to have remedy, and to flay the " fame of thy fell with all thou canst do. Be not deceived his, to think that the world will be ever again at the same pass, as it was before this law took place. And as it is a safer course and lesse "dangerous to let a naughty and obfinat perion alone, that he be not called into question at all; "than after he is once accused to juffer him to be quit and go away unpunished: even so this ex-" ceffive fuperfluity, would have been more to crable if it had not been medled & tempered with-"al than it wil be now upon the very binding and curbing thereof: much like a wild and favage " beaft let loofe after it hath been tyed up a time, and to made more fell and angry. To conclude therfore of this opinion am I, that of no hand the law Oppia be repealed : and fo I pray all the T. "Gods to vouchtafe for to biels and turn to good, what soever you do or go about, Whenhe had " thus faid, those Tribuns also of the Commons, who openly promised and protested to oppose themselves, and to cross the repeating of the law, made some brief speeches to the same effect. 6. Then L.Valerius role up to maintain the bill by him proposed for the revoking of that law and " fpake as followeth. " If privat men had stepped forth and advanced forward either to approve The Oration and periwade, or to reject & diffinade that which by us is proposed, I my self also without open-"ing my mouth would have attended your wil & expected the delivery of your suffrages, as think-"ing it had been sufficiently debated and discoursed already, whatsoever might be said for both " parties. But now fith that the Conful M. Porcine Cato, a man of great reputation & gravity, not " only by his countenance and authority, (which alone without any word at all spoken had been M " important enough & effectual) but also in a long premeditate Oration framed with much fludy and forethinking, hath impugned and inveighed against our proposed ordinance, I must of nees ceffity answer him again as briefly as I can. Who nevertheless bath ipent more words in reprowing and chastising the matrons & dames of the City, than he hath bestowed reason to the puropofe in diffwading our new law & all verily for this intent that he might leave it doubtful, whe-"ther the women had done that which he blamed them for as indu ed by their own motives or "feduced by us and our fuggestions. As for me the protection directly of the cause I will take in "hand, and not bufy and trouble my head in defence of our persons, against whom the Consul "hath rather granced and girded at, by way of big words, than charged indeed by found reasons, "It hath pleased him to cal this, An atlembly and musinous meeting: yea, and otherwhiles he ter- N " meth it. An infurrection and fecession of womensbecause the wives in open place intreated you " to repeal that law, now in time of peace, in the flourishing and blessed state of the Common-" weal, which during those troublesome daies of war, had been enacted against them. I wot full well that both these words and other besides are very significant, sought out, and picked for the "purpole, to enforce and aggravate the matter. And we all know, that M. Cato is an Orator not " only grave and earnest but otherwhiles also fell, sharp and bitter how ever otherwise by natural " disposition he be of a mild spirit and courteons enough. But to the point. What new & strange " thing is this that our wives have done, in coming abroad and a flembling themies es in compa-" nies about a matter that fo much concerneth and importeth themselves? What were they nee ver seen before now, abroad in open street? I will take the pains, O Caro to turn over our own O " book of Originals against your self. Listen and mark how often they have done the semblable, "and alwaies truly for the common good and benefit of the State. And first and foremost, in the "very beginning and infancy of this City, even in the reien of K. Romulus, when the Capitol was "taken and held by the Sabins; when in the midft of the Common place, they were ranged in bat-" rel array and ready to fight a bloudy field, was not the quarrel ended and the conflict flayed by "the dames and wives that ran in & put themselves between the two armies? After the KK, were driven out and expelled, What hapned tho When as the legions of the Volicians under the conduct of C. Martins incamped within 5 miles of Rome, were they not the matrons of the City that turned back this army, which doubtlets would have forced our City & put it to ranfack? And " is not this likewife as true, that when the Gauls were possessed of Rome and masters thereof, the dames of the City and none but they, even by the conlent of all men, came forth into the open fireets, made a contribution, and laid down that gold which paid for the raniom and redempti-"on of the City? No longer fince than in the last Punick war (because I will not stand so much "upon antiquities) was it not thus, that not only when the City was at a fault for money, the "widows stocks supplied the want of the common treasure? but also at what time as we were "driven to leek for new Gods, and to fend for them afar off to fuccour us in our extremities; all B" the wives & matrons of the City went to the Sea fide forto receive the goddess Mother Idea? "The occasions (qd, he) are different, and the case is not alike. Neither is it my purpose or any " part of my meaning to compare causes, and to prove they are all one. This only I stand upon, and take it sufficient to excuse and cleer the women, for bringing up no strange novelty, in that they · shewed themselves in open place. To proceed therefore: seeing that no man made any wonder then, of that which women did in undertaking the affairs that concerned all alike as well men " as women: marvail we now that they do the lemblable, in a cause that properly and peculiarly " pertaineth to themselves? And what great thing was it they did? Now in good faith we are too coyand squeamish of our hearing, and our ears over nice and delicate, if when masters distain "not to hear the praiers of their fervants and flaves, we fcorn to give ear to the requests of ladies C " and dames of honor. But now I come to the matter in question, in regard whereof the Conful " his Oration confifted in two points. For first, he took it very ill that any law at all once enacted " should be rovoked: and secondly, he stood upon this that above all others the law devised and "made for repreffing the superfluous ornaments and attire of women should remain in force for "ever. So it should seem, that the first part (a common defence as it were, of all the laws) was a " speech befitting the place and person of a Consul: but the other against the exceeding pomp of " women, more properly became a man (as himself) of most severe life and precise carriage. And " therefore it is great doubt and to be feared, left we should seduce you into some errors, if we " lay not down and shew plainly the vanity and defect both in the one and in the other. For as I " confess, that of those laws which are devised and established not for a time and by occasion of D . some particular occurrence, but for ever and to the perpetual good of a City, none ought to be "abolished; unless it be so that by use and experience the same be checked and found hurtful, or a by some change of the State become needlels and superfluous: so I see evidently, that those staas tuts and ordinances which are brought in to fit and serve some seasons, are mortal (if I may so es say) and mutable with the times, And oftentimes we see, that war disclaimeth those laws which « peace proclaimeth; and peace pulleth down that which war fet up: like as in the government and rule of a ship, one thing is requisit in fair weather and calm Sea, another in foul and trouble. a some tempests. These things thus being in nature divers and distinct, let us consider I pray you, . of whether fort is this law that now we are in hand to revoke. What? is it one of the ancient 4; and royal laws made by the Kings, and equal in time with the foundation of our City? or (that E a which is the next in time and authority) was it fet down and written in the twelve Tables by the Decemvirs, created of purpole to devise and make laws? Is it of that nature without the which as our ancestors were of opinion, that the honesty and honour of matrons could not the preserved : so we are to fear likewise lest by the repealing thereof, we overthrow the modeat flyschaftity, and integrity of maried women? Why? who knoweth not that this is a new law cc of 20 years standing and continuance and no more, made whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius ce were Confuls? And feeing that without it, wives lived fo many years before in good name and a fame, and in passing good order: tell me what danger can ensue, and why we need to fearlest if c, it be anulled, they should break out to al loosenes and disorder. Mary, if this law had been made at first, toggage the wantonnels of women, believeme then it were greatly to be doubted, that F at the putting down thereof would flir them up again to their former outrage. But to what nd ce it was devised; the time it felf is able to shew and testifie. Annibal being in Italy, had won a via ctory at Canner he was now master of Tarentum, Lord of Arpi, and possessed of Capua: every e, hourmen looked when he would march forward and advance his enfigns against Rome: our al-Lies were revoked and gone: fouldiers we had no more of our own to supply and make up the « decated bands; no mariners and Sea fervitors could we find for the maintenance of our Arma tedo: all our treasure in the City Chamber was spent and consumed. Driven we were to this caigent, as to take up bondflaves for to ferve in wars, and to buy them of their mafters for day, ce yea, and to make payment of their price after the war was ended. For want of money also the C Publicans and Parimors of our demain and publick profits, undertook to ferve the army with G com, and to furnish us with all things needful for war at a certain price, and gave us the like day a and time of payment. The Gally flaves that served at the oar we sound and maintained with "our own proper and private charges; and a rate and proportion was fet down according to "Our revenues and worth in the subsidy book, what number every one should be charged with. All the gold and filver that we had in private we brought forth in common, and the Senators themselves led the way first, and gave good ensample. The widdows and orphan Children

we should not have in our houses either of gold or filver, wrought in plate or otherwise above H " fo much, nor of filver and brais in coin and current money beyond a certain proportion limit. "ted. At fuch a time, our dames (belike) were fet all upon their braveries, pruning trimming, and er tricking themselves, in such fort, as the law Oppia must needs be devited, there was no other "remedy to keep down their excessive pride and superfluous expence in their attire and ornaer ments: even then, I fay, when by occasion that the solemn featt and facrifice of Ceres was dif-"continued, by reason of the general mourning and heavy chear of all the wives of the City, the "Senat was fain to take order, that they should finish and end their forrowful mourning within "thirty dayes. Who is so blind that seeth not, how in regard only of the poverty and extream "calamity of the City, and because all the monies of private persons should be converted into a 4 common flock, and for a publick use, this law was first framed, drawn, and set down, so long I "only to fland in firength and vertue, as the cause of penning and writing it should endure and "continue? For otherwise, if those acts and decrees of the Senat, if those orders and ordinances " of the Commons, respective unto that present time, should be in sorce, and observed for ever; "Why make we paiment of the loan money unto private men? Why do we fet and to ferm let " our commodities, our cultomes and revenues of the City unto farmers for ready rent? Why put "we forth our publick works for prefent money paid down upon the nail? Wherefore hav we " not flaves to ferve in our wars? Laftly, why are we not put to find mariners and oarmen, at our " own proper charges, as then we did? All other effates and degrees, all men elfe, of what calling "foever, feel a great change in the state of the City, from wo to weal, from advertity to properi-"ty; and shall our wives only miss the good thereof, and not once tast nor enjoy the fruits of g " peace and publick repose and tranquillity? Shall we that are men, be in purple and scarlet? shall " we wear our embrodered gowns and robes when we are Magistrats? Shall we put on our rich amyces and copes, when we exercise the function and ministery of the high Priests? shall our "children go in their fide garments, purfled afore with purple? shall we permit and priviledge the " head Officers and Magiltrats in our Colonies and Burrough Towns? nay, shall we suffer here at " Rome the Masters and Constables of every parish, the meanest and basest officers of all other to " wear embrodered gowns, & fludded with purple? and not only fo, forto grace and credit them-" felves, with these goodly ornaments and badges of worship and honour during their life, but al-" fo after their death, the same to be burned and buried with them? And shall we debar and for-" bid our women only to use purple and scarlet in their apparel? And when you the husband may "have purple and scarlet, carpets, counter-points, and foot-cloths, what reason is there to deny "vour wife, the mistress of the house, a gown or mantle of the same? And shall your horse be trap-" ped and barbed more richly, and better fet out with his capacifon than your wife arraied in her " apparrel? But in truth, for purple and scarlet, which are the worse for the wearing, and waxeth " bare me thinks I fee some reason such as it is (although it be very hard) of sparing and restraint: " mary for gold, wherein little or nothing is loft but the fashion and workmanship, what niggar-" dife, what mifery is this to make spare of it, and to deny it them? Nay, I dare ayow and abide by "it there is great benefit and use thereof in time of extremity; and it may help at a pinch both in copublick affairs, and in private occasions, as ye have found by good experience. But Carofaid compression and envy between this good wife and that if neither M " one nor other were allowed that liberty of apparel and ornaments. True it is, but inftead therecs of they all are mightily discontented and grieved at the heart in the mean while, disdaining to effee the wives of our allies of the Latine name and Nation, permitted to wear those ornaments a which they are forbidden to have, to feethern, I say, all gorgeously set out with spangles and .. jewels of gold, clad in their purple and scarlet cloths, riding in their coaches all over their cities, " whiles they at Rome take pains to go afoot on their ten toes, as if the State of the Empire were " feated in their Towns, and not in this their own City of Rome. This indignity were enough to "wound the hearts of men, and make them b'eed; what hurt doth it then, think you, to filly woen men, whom small matters, God wot, are wont to trouble? Alas poor souls a no magistracy and of government in State, no facerdotal dignities in the Church, no triumphs no ornaments N and fitles of honour, are they capable of, no gifts, no spoils and prizes gotten in wars, can fall to ce their shares. Neatness and fineness gay garments trim attire and gorgeous habiliments are the "honour and ornaments of women: in it they take delight, on it they fet their hearts, of it they at make their joy. And therefore well have our ancestors called all furniture for the decking of "women [Mundus Muliebris.] What lay they off in time of forcow and mourning, but their gold and purple? what put they on and refume again, when their mourning is past, but their gold and a purple? what hang they on them besides in time of publick joy and solemn processions but their ce better apparel, their richest attire & most costly ornaments? But peradventure, after ye have once cc repealed the law Oppis, it will not be in your power to over-rule them, if haply you should for-", bid them to wear any thing, that now the law restraineth them of. And perhaps some shall have a more ado with their daughters, their wives, and sisters, and find them less tractable and pliable counto their minds than now they are, Never fear that : women cannot shake off their obedience, co long as their Governors (be they fathers, husbands, or brethren) are alive; nay, of all other things they abhor and cannot brook to be at their own liberty, when it cometh by the death either of husbands or parents: Widows state and Orphans life, they may not abide. Be sure therefore they had rather have their ornaments and attire to be at the disposition of your selves, than

" of the law. And therefore, to speak a truth, you must in equity and reason protect and defend "them in kindness, and not oppress them with hardness and bondage: delight ye must to be called "their fathers and husbands, rather than their Lords and Masters, it pleased the Consul crewhile "to give them hard words and odious terms, calling this their meeting, A mutiny of women, and "a very infurrection and departure of theirs; and danger there is, no doubt, left being up once, they "will feize upon the mount Sacer, as sometimes the Commons did in their furnous anger, or elle 6 possess themselves of the Aventine, and there encamp and keep an hold. Weil, this weak and steeble sex, born to bear, must suffer and endure what soever ye shall ordain and set down against them. But take this withal at the loofe for a final conclusion that the greater power and autho-" rity ye have over them; the more discretion and moderation ye ought to the in that sover menty B" of yours, After debate of words paffed in this wife, in favor and disfavor of the taw, the day following the women flocked in greater multitudes into the open fireets, and banding them eives together, as it were, in one troop, they belet the dores and houses of the Bruts, who by increasing themselves, had hindred and crossed the bill preserved by their fellow Tribuns; and never gave they The 1.7 Gard over to keep this flir, until those Tribuns flaked in their opposition, for to inhibit the face, which species done, there was no doubt then, but all the tribes with one voice would abrogate and abolity that law. Thus twenty year after the enacting thereof, it was repealed and applied.

M. Porcius Cato after the abrogation of the law Oppia, presently departed with a fleet of five and twenty Gallies, whereof five were let out by Allies, and arrived in the Port of Luna, 10 which place he commanded his forces to affemble: and after by vertue of an edict tent out along c the Sea coast, he had gathered together vessels of all forts as he loosed from Luza, and proclaimed that they should all follow after him to the Port of Pyreneus, from whence he purposed to set forth against the enemy, with an Armado of many sail, and well appointed. Who having passed beyond the mountains of Liguria and the gulf of Gaul, arrived and met all together, at the day and place appointed. From thence they came against * Rhoula, where they expelled the Spanish * Rosca. garrison that held the fortrels. From Rhoda with a good gale of wind, they failed to Emporia. Where, all the whole army, excepting the mariners, were fet a land. At the same time Emporia were two Towns, separate one from the other by a wall. The one of them was inhabited by Greeks, who came from Phocea, from whence the Massilians also are descended: the other was possessed by Spaniards. But the Greeks Town lieth out into the Sea, so as the whole compals of n the wall is not half a mile about : but the Spanish Town seated farther into the Land, and divided from the Sea, is defended with a wall three miles in circuit. A third fort of Roman inhabitants from the Sea, is detended with a want the transfer of famous memory, after he had vanquished * Inlines. Pompers children. And at this day, they are confused and mingled one with another, and become one entire body, by reason that first the Spaniards, and afterward the Greeks were made freedenizens of the City of Rome. A man might well marvail seeing how open they lie of the one side to the main Sea, how exposed they are on the other fide to the danger of the Spaniards, a Nation so fierce and warlike, what thing it was that garded and protected them? Discipline it was and good government, and nothing else, which maintained and preserved them in that weakenes of theirs; discipline I say, which is ever best intertained of them, who live in sear of the mightier that are E round about them. One quarter of the wall looking to the fields, is passing strong and exceeding well fortified, having but one gate in all that fide; which ordinarily is alwayes warded by ong of the Magistrats. In the night, one third part usually of the citizens kept watch upon the walls. And this watch they maintained not for custome and inshion, nor by vertue of any law: but they performed it with as greatcare, yea, and went the round and faw to the fentinels with as much diligence, as if the enemies were hard at gates. A Spaniard came not within the City; neither went they forth themselves, unless it were upon just occasion. But on the Sea side the issue was open for any manat his pleasure. By that gate which turneth toward the Spanish Town they never nied to go forth but in great number, even a third part welneer of the Townsmen, and those who the night before had watched upon the walls. And this cause induced them to go abroad, for that the Spa-F niards being no men at Sea gladly would traffick and trade with them: willingly buying of them their strange merchandise from forein parts brought in by ships: and venting unto them again their Land commodities and fruits arising of the main. The desire of this mutual commerce and necessary intercourse was the cause, that the Spanish Town was open to the Greeks. And in greater fafety, and fecurity they were also, by reason that they were shadowed under the wing of the Roman amity, which they intertained with as great loyalty as the Massilians, although they were nothing to mighty and puissant. And even at this time they received the Consul and his army with great courtefie and liberality. Cato so journed there some few dayes, whiles he was advertised by his cipials where his enemies abode, and what their forces were and because he would not be idle whiles he stayed there, he bestowed all that time in training and exercising his souldiers. It G happed to be that season of the year, when the Spaniards had their com within their granges teady for the thrashing floor, whereupon he forbad the cornpurveiors to provide grain, and sene them home to Rome. War, saith he, shall feed and maintain it self. Being departed from * Emporie, he wasted and burnt the territory of the enemies, forced them to run away in every place where he Stephano, came, and put them in exceeding fright.

"At the same time, as M. Helvius departed out of the farther Province of Spain with 6000 Clusio.

gatrison souldiers delivered unto him by the Pretor, he was encountred by a great army of the

Celtiberians, before the Town Illiturgum. Valerius writeth, that they were 20000 flrong: that H 12000 of them were flain, the Town Illiturgum won again, and all above 14 years of ageput to the fword. From thence Helvius marched to the camp of Cato: and because the countrey was cleer from enemies, he fent back the garrison into the nether Spain, and took his journey to Rome. where he entred the City Ovant in pety triumph, for the happy success atchieved in his affairs. He brought into the treasury, of filver in bullion or Ingots, 14732 pound weight: of filver coin 17023 bigate peeces: and of Oscane filver 120338 pound weight. The cause why the Senat denied him full triumph, was this, for that he warred under the conduct and name of another, and not in his own province. But it was two years before he returned, by reason that the year between he was flayed there, lying fick of a long and grievous dileale, and put over his government to Que Minutius his successor. Whereupon Helvius likewise entred the City of Rome in that manner of I triumph, two months only before his successor Q.Minnting triumphed. He likewise brought into the Chamber of the City 34800 pound weight of filver in mass: of bigats in coin 78000: of Oc-

cape filver 278000 pound. All this while the Conful lay encamped in Span not far from Emporia. Thither repaired unto him from Bil stages a Prince of the Ilergets, three Embassadors, whereof his son was one: complaining that their forts were affailed by force of arms, and they had no other hope to make re-fiftance, unless they might have a guard of Roman fouldiers to defend them, 5000 say they will be sufficient: for never would the enemies abide by it if such a power came against them. The Consul answered them and said, that he had a feeling and compassion of the peril or fear (whether it was) wherein they flood; howbeir, he was not at that time furnished with such forces, that he K might tafely spare so many out of his main army, thereby to dismember the same and to empair his frength, confidering a mighty hoft of his enemies was not far off, with whom he looked every day, and he knew not how toon, to joyn battail in open field with banner displaied. The Embassadors hearing this, tell down profitate at the Confuls feet, and fined tears, humbly befeeching him not to forfake them in this piteous plight, "For whither (fay they) shall we go, if we be repul-" fed from the Romans? No allies we have besides, nor other hope in all the world. This danger "we might have avoided wel enough, if we would have been falle and difloyal; if we would have " banded and rebelled with other Spaniards: but no menaces, no terrors prefented unto us could "drive us to renounce our fealty, hoping alwayes that we should have help and succour enough "from the Romans: but now if no help, if no relief come from thence; if we be denied at the L "Confuls hand; heaven and earth we call to witnes, that we must be forced, full against our wills "and upon mere necessity, to revolt from the Romans, for fear we drink of the same cup that the "Saguntins have done afore us; and choose we will to die with the rest of the Spaniards for company, rather than perish alone by our felves. So for that day they were dismissed without other answer. But all the night following the Conful was much diffracted in mind, and careful in both respects. Unwilling he was to cast off his allies and see them destitute; and as unwilling again to break his army: confidering that in fo doing, he might either delay the opportunity of giving b trail or endanger himself in the very instant of conflict. But at length he resolved in no wife to diminish his own forces; doubting left in the mean while he should receive some dishonor at the enemies hand. As for his affociats, he thought it best to intertain them with good hopes, for M want of better helps; confidering that oftentimes and especially in war, outward semblances and vain shews, are held and taken for truth and substance, and serve the turn well enough : and when a man is throughly periwaded that he hath aid and fuccour, the very truft and confidence thereof hath ministred heart to give the venture of some exploit and preserved him as well as the thing it felf. The next morrow he delivered this answer unto the Embassadors. That albeit he seared to abate his own firength, in ferving other mens turn with any part of his forces, yet he had at this present more regard of their occasions and dangerous estate than of his own. Whereupon he gave commandment, that a third part of all his bands and companies should have warning to bake and dresse viands with all speed, for to best ow and lay in the ships; and streightly he charged that they should be rigged and ready appointed against the third day; and willed withal, two of the M Embassadors to report to much to Bilistages and the Ilergets. As for the young Prince his son, he detained still with him, used him graciously, and bestowed favours and rich gifts upon him bounteously. The Embassadors took not their leave nor departed, before they saw the souldiers embarked : and thus by making relation hereof, as a thing affured and past all peradvenure, they filled the heads not of their own friends only, but also of the enemies, with the bruit of Roman aids coming neer at hand. The Conful now when he had fet this countenance of the matter, and made sufficient semblance to serve his purpose, gave order that the souldiers should be disbarked again & fee a land: and himself seeing now that the time of the year approached commodions for action and execution of martial affairs, dislodged and removed his standing winter camp within a mile of Emporia. From whence (as any occasions and opportunities were presented) he led forth O his fouldiers a foraging and plundering into the enemies land, fometime one way and sometime another, leaving alwayes a competent guard to defend the camp. Ordinarily their manner was to fleal out by night, to the intent that both they might go on ftil farther from their leaguer, & also furprise the enemies at unawares and unprovided by which means not only his new & raw souldiers were exercised, but also many of his enemies were caught up and came short home: whereupon rhey durst no more peep out of their forts & holds of desence. Now after he had made sufficient

A proof of the hearts as well of his own men as of his enemies, he commanded all the Marshals, Colonels. Horsemen, and Centurions, to assemble before him: and unto them he made this speech, Coloners, crottemen, and come, that you to often have withed for; in which you may shew The Oration at full your vertue and valour. Your fervice hitherto harh been more like the manner of for- of cato to his argers than warriors: but now shall ye come to a main battail, and as enemies, fight hand to Captains and "hand with projetied enemies. From henceforth you may if you will, not wait their fields only galante. "and spoil their territory, but ramack the pillage of rich and wealthy cities. Our fathers before and anceltours in times path, when as in Spain there were both Generals and armies of Car-"thaginians, having themselves no leaders and commanders, no souldiers and torces there, yet "would they needs have this article among others capitulated in the accord and composition B "with the Spaniards, That the River of Iberts should limit their Seignory and dominion, Now "ar this day, when two Pretors and a Contul, when three entire Roman armies have the go-"vernment and charge of Spain; now, I say, after ten years space almost, wherein no Carthagi-" nians have let toot and been leen in all these quarters of both provinces, we have lost our seig-"nory on this fide ibersa. This mult ye recover and win again by force of arms, by manhood and waiour; yemust I say, compet this nation, more rash and inconsiderate in rebeiling, than con-"stant and retolute in maintaining war, for to receive once more the yoke or subjection, which " they have shaken from off their necks. Having exhorted and encouraged them in this manner, he gave them to understand, that he would fet forward in the night and lead against the enemies camp. And o he let them depart to refresh their bodies. At midnight, after he had devoutly C taken with him the figns and approbations of the birds for his better speed, he put himself in his journey; and because he might be seized of some place to his liking before the enemies should descryhim he set a compais in his march, and led his souldiers clean beyond their camp. And having by day light fer his companies in battel array, he fent out three cohorts, even close to the rampier and trench of the enemy. The barbarous people wondering to feethe Romans shew themselves behind at their back, ran to and iro to take arms. Mean while, the Consul held his men with these and such like speeches: "My souldiers (quoth he) there is no other hope now "left, but in mere frength and valour, and I of very purpose have wrought it so. Between us "and our camp the enemies are encamped all; behind at our back we have our enemies Land. "The brivest courses are ever lafell, namely, to build and ground our hope surely upon vertue. D. And herewithal he gave order, that the cohorts aforefaid thould retire of purpole to train forth the barbar ous people, by making femblance of retreat and flight. And so fell it out in very deed as he thought and supposed: for they imagining that the Romans for very fear were retired, issued forth by heaps out of the gate, and belpred with armed men all the ground, that lay between their own camp and the enemies battel. And whiles they made great haft to embattel themselves, the Conful who was already arranged in battel array, and in all respects well appointed, charged upon them before they were marshalled and set in order. First he put forth the corners and wings of horsemen from both points and flanks of the battail; but they of the right side were straightwayes repulied, and by their halfy and fearful retreating, caused the sootmen also to be mightily affraid. Which the Conful perceiving, he commanded two elect cohorts of footmen to wheel E about the right flank of the enemies, and to shew themselves at their backs before the other companies of footencountred and charged one another. This indidain terror afrighted the enemies, but fet all upright again and recovered the bartail of the Romans, which through the fear of the Cavalry began to shrink and go down. Howbeit the horiemen and sootmen both of the right point, were so troubled and so far out of order, that the Consul was forced to pluck some of them back with his own hand, and turn them with their faces affron the enemy. Thus all the while that the shor lasted, the skirmish was doubtful: so as now the Romans in the skirmish, had much ado to make head and stand to it in the right side, whereas the fright and slight sirst began, But on the left and all afront, the barbarous had the worft, and with great horror they looked behind and faw their enemies how they played upon their backs and refred not. After they had F done with flinging their iron darts and lancing their fiery javelins, they drew their fwords; and herewith began the conflict afresh. They were not wounded now from a far off by blind chance andhap hazard, they knew not from whence; but foot to foot they flood, and hand to hand they coped and let drive one at another: no hope at all was now but to trust in pure strength and main force. The Conful feeing his men wearied, encouraged and retreshed them by fending for to relieve and maintain the fight, certain cohorts out of the rereward. This new battaillon well in heart, and with fresh weapons, charged the enemies toiled and tired: and being ranged inpointed wife like a quoin or wedge, at the first hot onfet brake their arraies and being once difordered, they put them to flight, and in scattering wise they ran as fall as their legs would carry them, to their camp. Cate feeing them flie on all hands, mounted on horfeback and rode him-G felf to the second legion which was in the rereward for supply, and commanded to advance the flandards and enfigns before him, to march apace, and to approach the camp of the enemies for togive an affault. If he efpied any one to flep out of his tank, he would ride before and rap him with his light javelin that he had in his hand; commanding the Marthals and C. prains to had flice him for it. Now was the enemies camp at the point to be affaulted, and the Romans were with flones, pikes, perches, and all kind of weapons fet back and driven from the trench, But when

this fresh legion approached neer, then both the affailants were more encouraged, and also the enemies fought more luftily in defence of their rampier. The Conful cast his eye all about H him, to fpie how to break in at some place or other where least refishance might be made; and feeing the guard thin about the left gate, thicher he conducted the Principals and the Haffari of the second legion: but the corps de guard which warded that gate, was not able to endure their violent charge. The rest on the other side, seeing the enemies within the rampier, abandoned the camp, and flung away their enfigns and weapons. The fouldiers of the fecond legion followed the chase and killed them as they ran away, whiles the other ransacked and rifled their tents. Valerius Antias writeth, that there were 60000 fell that day upon the edge of the iword, Cato himself (that never loved to make the least of his own praise-worthy acts) saith, there were many flain; but letteth not down what number. He is thought to have performed that day three peeces of fervice worthy of great praise and commendation: first, in that he fet a compass with his army t far from his ships, far from his camp, and gave battail in the midst of the enemies, where his men could repose no hope at all but in their own vertue and valour: secondly, for sending those cohorts behind the enemies to charge upon their backs: and thirdly, for that he caused the second legion to march a great pace under their colours displaid, ranged as they were and ordered in battail array, for to approach and affail the gates of the enemies camp, whiles all the rest were disbanded and spread all abroad to pursue theenemy in chase.

The four and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

After this victory atchieved, he fat not fill in rest and repose, but having sounded the retreat and brought his own fouldiers loden with pillage into the camp, he allowed them somesew hours for their night fleep, and led them forth into the territory of the enemy to forrage and spoil: which was as effectual to enforce the Spanish Emporitans, and all their neighbour borde- k rers to yeeld subjection, as the unhappy battel fought the day before. Many also of other Cities. which were retired to Emporia for reluge, rendered themselves to his devotion: whom he entertained all with gracious words, and when he had made them good cheer, bestowing wine and cates plentifully upon them, he fent them home to their own houses. Then immediately he diflodged and removed his camp. And all the way as he marched with his army there reforted Embaffadors from divers States that yeelded themselves unto him, By that time that he was come as far as Taracon, all Spain on this fide Iberus, was wholly subdued: and the barbarous people brought in as presents unto the Conful, all the captives and prisoners, as well Romans as Allies. and namely, Latins, who by many and fundry chances had been taken in Spain. The bruit went commonly abroad, that the Conful would lead his power into Turdet ania. There was a false alarm r likewise given, and spoken it was, That he would visit the mountainers that lay out of the way. Upon this vain and headless rumour, there were seven forts belonging to the State of the Bergistans that revolted from him: but the Consul led his army against them, and without any memorable battel reduced them under obedience. And the Conful his back was no fooner turned, and he gone to Taracon, but they rebelled again, even before he was departed from thence in any other expedition. Subdued they were the second time, but they found not the like favour as before, to have pardon: for they were all fold like flaves in open market, under the garland because they should not thus every while trouble the peace.

In this meantime P, Manlius the Pretor, after he had received the old army at the hands of Q. Mutius whom he succeeded, and joined thereto the other army of old souldiers belonging to M Appins Claudins, and which were come out of the farther Spain, he made an expedition into Turdetania. Now these Turdetans of all other Spaniards are counted to be the worst souldiers, howbeit, in confidence of their great numbers and multitudes they came forward and encountred the Romanforces. But the men of arms had no fooner charged them, but prefently, they were difarraied. As for the footmen, they fought in manner not at all. The old approved fouldiers, who knew the enemies very well, and were experienced in feats of arms, made a quick dispatch of this skirmish, and soon put all past peradventure. Howbeit, the war was not so ended, nor determined in one battel. The Turdetans levied and waged 1000 Celtiberians, and io maintained wat afresh with forrain mercenary forces.

The Conful being stung already with the Rebellion of the Turdetans, and supposing that other N Cities would do the like upon any good occasion and opportunity disfurnished all the Spaniards on this fide Iberus of their armor and munition. Which they took for fuch an indignity, that many of them for very melancholly killed themselves: a martial and warlike nation, that thought they were as good be out of the world, as turned out of their arms; and reckoned no life, without their weapons. The Conful having intelligence hereof, commanded the Senators of all those Cities to repair unto him : and when they were assembled together, he used this speech unto them. "It " concerneth you (qd. he) no less than us, to give over this rebelling and warring. For never yet "to this day have yeentred into the action, but with more loss and damage of Spaniards, than "toil and travel of the Roman army. To prevent this mischief that it should not happen, I sup-"pose one good way it is, to contrive and work so, that ye might not possibly be able to rebel. O 6 Effect this I would fain, by the eafiest mean and course of all other. Assist me I pray you herein "with your good counsel: I assure you I will not be directed by any advise more willingly, than by "that which you your selves shall give me. When they held their tongues, and would not speak a word, he faid unto them again, that he was content they should pause upon the matter, and consult therof a few daies. When they were called again & kept filence in this fecond meeting and conference as wel as in the former: he made no more ado, but in one day rased the wals of al their Cities:

A which done, he went forward against those that hitherto were not come in, not yeelded obedience : and into what quarters foever he came, he received all the States one after another, there bordering and adjoining, into his protection; fave only Segsfice, a wealthy City and of imporrance, the which he forced with mantelets and rolling pavoites, and fuch like fabricks, More difficulty in subduing these enemies he found, than others afore him who first came into Spain; in this regard, for that in times pass the Spaniards at the beginning revolted unto them, as being weary of the tedious yoke of subjection under the lordly government and tyranny of the Carthaginians. But Caro had more ado with them now, in that out of liberty and freedom, which they had ufurped and been used to, he was to ingage them (as it were) bond, and to bring them again to servitude, Besides, he found all out of frame and order, whiles tome of them were up in arms, others R were forced by fiege to revolt, as not able to have held out long, unless they had been rescued and fuccoured in time. But of this nature and courageous mind was the Conful, that he would himfelf in person be present and manage all affairs, as well those of smallest moment, as also those of greatest weight and conjequence: and not only devise and give direction what was best to be done, but would himselfiet to his hand, and execute most of the exploits and effect them fully. There was not one amongst them all that he commanded with more severity and rigour, than his own felf. In living neerly, in spare feeding in much watching, in painful travel he firived to surpais and ourgo the meanest common souldiers. And no priviledge challenged he, no advantage sought he to himlelf in his whole army above others, but only honour and foversign command.

The Pretor P. Manlius had the more trouble in his war-fervice, by reason of the Celtiberians, C. whom(as it hath been faid before) the enemies had levied and hired with their mony. And therefore the Conful being tent unto by the Ptetorhis letters, jed his legions allo thither. Being there arrived, (now the Celtiberians and Turditans were severally encamped apart one from the other) the Romans fell presently to maintain light skirmishes with the Turditans, and ever and anon charged their corps de guards and how safely and inconfideratly foever they began the game, yet in they ever went away winners. As for the Celtiberians, the Conful lent cettain Tribuns or Knight Marshals unto them to empare, giving them in charge to make them an offer and tender unto them the choice of three conditions, First, if they could be content to arrange themselves to serve under the Romans, and to receive at their hands double wages to that they bargained for with the Turditans, Secondly, whether they would be willing to go their waies home under lafe con-D duct and publick fecurity, besides that their siding with the Roman enemies should not be laid to their charge, nor bring them within the compais of any danger. Thirdly, if they had more mind to war, than, that they should set down some time and place, when and where they might come to an iffue, and trie it out in a fet battail. The Celtiberians required to take a day for to confider better upon their points. So they aftembled together in counfel, with great trouble and contuhon, by reason that some Turderans were thrust in among them; upon which occasion, they might worfe grow to any conclusion. Now albeit nocertain it was, whether there would be any was or peace with the Celtiberians, yet the Romans gathered their provision out of the territory andborroughs of their enemies, like as in time of peace: yea, and more than that, they entred oftentimes within their fortifications and defences, as if there had been some common traffick E and commerce agreed between them, by way of private truce. The Conful feeing he could not draw the enemy to a battail, first led certain companies lightly appointed with banners displaied, to raile booties in one quarter of the country, which as yet was free, and not tafted of the wars: but afterwards hearing that all the bag and baggage and other cariage of the Celtiberians was left at Sagunia, he let forward thither to give an alfault to the Town. But feeing that nothing would move and ftir them, he paied not only his own fouldiers their wages, but also the Ptetors stmy their due, and leaving the main hoft in the Pretor his camp, himself returned to the tab. River Ebre, accompanied only with leven cohorts. With these forces, as small as they were, he woncertain Towns, and there revolted unto him the Sederans, Auletans, and Suesserans. The Lacetans (a Nation living out of the way after a favage manner within the wilds and woods kept F dillinarms, not only upon a natural and inbred wildness, but also upon a guilty conscience, in that whiles the Conful and his army was emploied in the Turdulois war, they had made fuddain rodes and in utrions into the Lands of their Allies, and pitifully wasted the same. And therefore the Conful advanced forward to affault their Town, and led against it not only his own cohorrs and bands, but also the youth of his Allies, who had good cause to be angry, and to oppose themselves unto them. The Town which they inhabited, lay out in length, but was nothing to wide and large in breadth: and within one half mile or less, he pitched down his enfigns, and planted himself. There he left behind a guard of choice companies, and streightly charged them not to fir ont of that place, before he came unto them himfelf. The rest of his forces he led about unto the farther fide beyond the Town. Of all the aid-fouldiers that he had G about him, the greatest number were the youth of the Suesserans, and those he commanded to approach the wall for to give affault. The Lacetans, when they took knowledge of their atmorand colours calling to mind how often they had overrun them at their pleasure, and wasted their lands without the k or emperchment/how many and fundry times they had in ranged battel difcomfied & put them ro flight, all aconce fee open the gate, and fallied out upon them. The Sueffetanguage to little able to inflain the forcible charge of their onfer, that they hardly could abide theinstery thour & first cry. The Co. seeing now, that come to pass indeed which he suspected would be for rode a gallop upon the spur to those said cohorts of his own that were left on the other H fide under the Town, and taking them with him ingreat haft, whiles all the Townsmen were fpread abroad in following the chafe after the Suefletans, he led them into the Town at a place where there was no noise, no flirring, and not a man to be seen; and made himself master of all. before the Lacetans were returned back: but within a while he received them to mercy upon their submission: who, poor men, had nothing to yeeld and lote but their bare armor and weapons. Immediatly he followed the train of this victory, and led his forces against the hold or throng Town of Vergium. This was a receptacle and place of fure receit for certain Rovers and Theeves, who from thence nied to make many rodes into the peaceable parts of that Province. The principal and shief person of Vergium quit the place, and betook himself unto the Consuland began to excuse as well himself as the Townsmen; saying, that the government of the Town T and the statethereof lay not in their hands. For why? these robbers after they were once received in among them, feized themselves wholly of that strength, and had all at their command. The Conful willed him to go home again, and to devise and forge some likely and probable cause why he had been abient and out of the way; with this charge and direction, that when he faw him approach under the walls, and the robbers aforefaid wholly amused and occupied in desence thereof, then he should remember to join with the rest of his part and faction, and be possessed of the fortress and hold of the Town, This put he in practise and execution accordingly. So whiles the Romans of one fide scaled the walls, and they on the other fide had taken the fortress, these barbarians were juddainly at once jurprifed with a two-fold fear before and behind. The Conful when he had gotten the place into his own hands, gave order, that all those who were gotten it into the Calle and held it, hould remain free, themselves and all their kinred, and likewise enjoy their goods. The rest of the Vergetans he commanded the Treasurer to sell and make monv of them. As for the Rovers, they fuffred according to their deferts. After he had fet the Province in quiet, he laid great tributes and imposts upon the mines of iron and silver: which being once ordained and established, the whole province grew in wealth and riches, every day more than other. For these his exploits atchieved in Spain, the LL, of the Senat decreed, that there thould be a solemn procession at Rome, to endure for three dayes.

The fame winter, L. Valvrins Flacens the other Conful, fought in France a fet field with the power of the Boians, neer the foreft of Litaria, and wan the victory. And by reports, there were eight thouland Gauls there flain it he rest abandoned the war, and lipt every one into their own I. Hamlets and Villages. The rest of the winter the Cos. kept his army at Flacentia and Cremona-bout the Po, and repaired in these Ciries whatloever had been decated and demolsshed during the wars.

The affairs in Italy and Spain flanding in these terms: when T. Quintins had so passed the winter in Greece, the letting afide the Atolians (who neither had been recompensed according to the hope that they conceived of the victory, nor yet could long time like of repose) all Greece throughout in general enjoying the bleffing of peace and liberty, flourished and mainteined their state exceeding well, admiring no leis the temperance, justice, and moderation of the Roman General after victory, than his valour and prowefs in war: there was an Act of the Senat of Rome brought and presented unto him, importing thus much, That war was determined against Nabis M the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. Which when Quintins had read, he published and proclaimed a general Diet or Courcel at Corinth against a certain day, when and where all the States associats should assemble by their delegats and Embassadors. Now when there was met together from all parts a frequent number of Princes and great personages, in such sort, that the very Ætolians also were not absent, Quintus used unto them this or the like speech. "The Romans & Greeks have warred against King Philipas ye well know; and as with one mind and common counsel they "have so done, so either of them had several quarrels unto him, and privat causes and occasions "by themselves to take arms. For Philip had broken the league and amity with us Romans, one while by fending aid and maintenance to the Carthaginians our enemies: otherwhiles by affail-"ing our allies in the fe parts : and to you wards he hath to demeaned himfelf, that albeit we could N "forget and put up all the wrongs that he hath done unto us, the very injuries that ye have te-" ceived at his hands, minister sufficient cause unto us to war against him for your sake. As for this dayes consultation, it refleth wholly in your selves. For, this I propound unto you, Whe-"ther your will is to luffer Argos (which as ye know your felves Nabis the tyrant holdeth) to " remain fill under him in obedience: or whether you think it meet and reason, that amost noble "and ancient City as it is, seated in the very heart of Greece, should be reduced unto liberty, to "enjoy the same condition and state wherein other Cities of Peloponnesus and Gresce do stand. "This con ultation Isay, as you well see, entirely toucheth you and your good, and concerneth " us Romans no farther than thus, that by the servitude of that one only City, we cannot have "the full and entire glory of letting Greece wholly in liberty. But if you regard not the flate of O that City, and are not moved with the example thereof and the danger, for fear the contagion "of this mischiefspred farther: we for our parts are content, and take all in good worth, and will " not set you down and teach you what to do. Only I require your advice in this point, minding to resolve upon that, which the Major part of you shall carry by voices. After the Roman General had ended his speech, all the rest began to deliver their opinions. And when the deputed de egate or agent for the Athenians had magnified and extolled as highly as possibly he could, the

A good demerits of the Romans towards Greece, yielding them great thanks, that upon their request they had granted them aid against Philip, and without any petition at all offered their help and fuccour against Nahis the tyrant; and leemed therewish to be oftended and displeased at some, who nevertheless in their talk and speeches found fault and carped at these logreat favours and deserts; yea, and spake badly of nuture events, whereas it behoved them rather to acknowledge and consets how much they were bound and beholden already to the Romans for good turns past: it well appeared that he pointed out directly the Ætolians, and girded at them. "Whereupper and the standard of the standard past in the standard past

"common cause, for love of their own privat flatteries, Moreover, he complained that the Achæsans, who first served. Philip in his wars, and at the last selection with the wind and fortune to frown upon him sell away like distoyal traitors. So possessed them in every sold of the compassand gain unto them the City of Argol. As for the Etolians, the first and principall enemies of Philip, and alwaies allies and firends to the Romans, how sold every enemies of Philip, and alwaies allies and sirends to the Romans with compassand gain unto them the league, to enjoy their to was and tetricories, after Philip was vanquished, were notwithstanding put besides Echimum and Pharssall. He charged the Romans with fraud and deceit, who pretending an outward shew, a vanitie and colour of liberty, held the Cities of Chalcis and Demetria with strong sartions and tween Philip made some stay and halting to withdraw and void from thence his armed aguards, they were ever wont to object and surshard Green would not in the new this armed "guards, they were ever wont to object and lays that Greece would not refer be in freedom, fo long as Co-Chaleis, Demetrias, and Corinth were in his hand: and finally he alledged againt them, that under the member of Argos and Noisis, they fought occasion to remain still in Greece and keep their armies there. Let them (quoth he) trainfort their legions once into Italy, the Ætolians would then undertake and promise, that Nobis should remove his garrison out of Argos upon composition of with good will, or este they would compell him by force and arms, to be over-ruled by the puissance of all Greece united together in one general consent. By this vain babble of his, he rouled Ariseus first, the Prator of the Achaens, who spake in this wise. Never will spater open, Mars, quoth he, and Queen Junothe Patrones of Argos, suffer that City to be the recompence of prize between the Lacedemonian Tyrant, and their pilling and thieving Ætolians: to be brought to this hard point and these terms of extremity, as to sustain more mitery and calmi-

Dry when it is recovered by us, than when it was won and taken by him. O Quintius, it is not the us, in cale they should make them that can defend us from these robbers. What will then become of Nought have they of the Greeks but their language, like as they carry nothing of men but their should make themselves a fort and Castle of strength in the midst of Peloponnessus, should have they of the Greeks but their language, like as they carry nothing of men but their and cruell than any barbarians, nay, they are more savage than the most wild and ravenous beasts that be, We beseeth you therefore O Romans, both to recover Argon out of the hands of Nabia, and also to establish the State of Greece in such fort, that ye leave these parts also save and leave the nough from the robberies and theeving hostility of these Ærolians, Itan Roman General Quintins, seeing them of all sides to blame and revoke the Ærolians, slaid, that he would have answered

E them himself, but that he perceived them all so hatefully bent against them, that more needfull it was that they were to be appealed, than farther provoked. And therefore holding himself faitssled and contented with that opinion which was conceived of the Romans and Ætolians, he faid, that he would demand what their pleasure was to advise, concerning the war against Nabis, nucles he rendred Arges to the Achaeus? And when they all were of one mind to make war, he exhorted them to send aids proportionably to the power and strength of each State and City, To the Ætolians hefen an Embassador, more to discover and lay open their intention (as it sell out accordingly) than upon any hope he had to obtain ought at their hands. Untoothe Provost Marshals of the camp, he gave commandment to send for the army from Elasia.

About this time, when the Embassadors of King Antiochus came unto him to treat about F alliance and a league, he answered, That he could say nothing to them nor determine of that point in the ablence of those Delegats abovesaid; and therefore they were to repair unto the Senat of Rome. Then, himself in perion prepared to make an expedition and voyage against Argos, with those forces which were brought from Elatia. And when he was about Cleane, Aristanus the Prator, with 10000 foot of Achrans, and 1000 horse met him in the way: and not far from theme they joyned both their loces and encamped together. The next day after they came down into the Platin of Argos, and choice a place to fortifie and lye in leaguer about four miles from Argos. Now was Pribagoras the Captain of the Lacedemonian gartino, who had both matried the than his daughter, and was his, wives brother besides. This Pribagoras against the coming of the Romans, had fortified with strong guards both the Castles (for two there are within Argos)

G and other places, which either had easie accels or were inspected, but as he was employed in these provisions and preparations, he could not dissemble and hide the sear which this arrivall and approach of the Romans Strake into him: and beside this forrain terrour from without, there hapted also a junctiline must within. There was one Damoeles an Argive. (a young Gentleman and reciprocal cash, had consecret with event of more plain and incompare than wildown and discretion) who at the first by interposing a mutuall and reciprocal cash, had consecret with certain persons of good sufficiency, about expelling the garison; but, whiles he shadled to strengshen the conspiracy and his own side, he was not well assured of their sidelity, and could not judge which of them were true and which not. As he ral- H ked upon a time with his complices, the Captain of the garrifon fent for him by one of his quard: whereupon he perceived that his complot was revealed: he exhorted therefore the computators that were in the way to take arms with him, rather than to die by torture upon the rack: and to with some few about him he man hed forward into the market-place, crying often aloud, That as many as loved the falety of the Common-weal should follow him as their head and maintainer of their liberty: but no man moved he with his speech to go after him and take his part; for no hope faw they of any fuccour at all near at hand: fo far off were they from making good account of a fure guard of defence. And as helpake those words, the Lacedamonians were come round about him, and killed both him and his fellows. After this were others also apprehended; the most part of them were slain, and some few cast into prison. A great number the night following t flid down the wall by ropes, and fled to the Romans. These affured the Romans, that if their army had been near the gates, the commotion and conspiracy aforesaid would have taken effect and in case their camp approached nearer, the Argives would not be in quiet, but make some insurrection: whereupon Quintius sent out the footmen lightly appointed, together with the horsemen; who skirmished with the Lacedamonians about Cylarabis (a publike school and place of exercise about a quarter of a mile out of the City) who were fallied out at the gate, and without any great difficulty chaled them within the town: and in that very place where the conflict was. the Roman Generall encamped. One day he spent in escouting an espiall, whether any new trouble and uproars arose among them within the City. But when he perceived once that they were all amort for fear, he affembled a Councill to take advice, Whether he were best to give the af- K fault upon Argos, or no? All the heads of Greece, (except Ariftanus) agreed with one accord. that fince there was no other cause of war elsewhere, it should begin there especially. Quinting in no case would like of that course, but willingly he gave ear with evident approbation unto Ariffanus, as he disconsied and reasoned against the generall opinion and consent of them all: and over and befides added this of himself, That confidering the war was enrerprised and taken in hand in the behalf of the Argives against the tyrant, there was nothing less beseeming and more without sence, than to leave the enemy himself, and to assail and batter the poor City of Argos, For his part he would fight at the head, even against the Lacedamonians and their tyrant, the principall cause of this war. Then having diffolved the Councill, he sent certain cohorts lightly appointed to purvey flore of grain. As much as could be found ripe in those parts was cut, mowed, and rea-T ped down immediatly and laid up: all that was green they trampled under foot and spoiled that the enemies foon after might have no good thereof. So he dislodged and removed from thence. and having passed over the mountain Parthenius, at three daies end he encamped in the territory of Carre near to Tegea. In which place he expected the aids of his allies before he would invade the territory of the enemies. From Philip there came a thousand and five hundred Macedonians, and of Theffalians forty horse. The Roman Generall staid not now for succours of men (whereof he had inflicient and plenty) but for his provision of victuals, which he had commanded the towns bordering near hand to furnish him withall. Besides, there came ereat forces by sea. and met him there : for by this time was Lucius Quintius arrived with forty fail from Leucas : alto eighteen covered thips of Rhoder. And now also was Eumenes the King, about the Islands Cy-M. clades, with ten close hatched and decked ships, thirty gallions, with other smaller vessels among, of fundry forts. Likewise of Lacedamonians that were exiled and banished persons there were very many; who chased and driven out by the oppression and wrongfull dealing of their tyrants, repaired now into the Roman Camp, in hope to recover their native country again. Now a great many had been expulsed in divers and fundry ages, fince time that the tyrant first usurped rule, and were possessed of Lacedamon. The chief of these exiled persons was one Agespolis, a manto whom by right of descent and linage the inheritance of the kingdom of Lacedamon appertained. He whiles he was but an Infant hapned to be expelled by Lycurgus after the death of Cleomenes, who was the first tyrant at Lacedamon.

The tyrant befer thus round about with wars threatning both from fea and land, and defitute in manner of all hope, (confidering the proportion of his forces to the power of his enemies:) N yet nevertheless neglected not to wage war, but levied out of Gress one thousand more even the chosen flower of all their youth) to the other thousand that he had from thence already. He had belides of mercenary fouldiers three thousand in arms: also ten thousand of his own subjects and Citizens of Lacedamon, together with those that he had taken out of the burroughs and villages in the country. Moreover, he fortified the City with trench and mure. And that there might arise no trouble and stir within the town, he held the spirits of men in awe with sear of sharp and rigorous punishments. And for asmuch as he could not hope nor imagine that they defired and wished his good and safety, for that he held some Citizens insuspition and jealousie: after he had brought forth all his forces into the plain, which they call * Dromos, he commanded the Laceda-O monians to affemble together without any armour and weapons to an audience; and when they were affembled he environed them with his armed guard. And after some few remonstrances by way of a short preamble, Why they ought to hold him excused at such a time, if he seared every thing, and made all fure as well as he could: confidering withall, it was expedient even for them also (as many as the present state of the world might bring in suspicion) to be kept short for being able to execute any attempt rather than be furprized in the midil of their practiles and complots, and to be punished accordingly reversion using an include agreets be all will have seriain perions in late condens, and durance, usual sich sime as the newspell be myenblown which now it comings. And when the premiss be once repulled from whom its danger them will be in case domestically come may be prevented them, incoming my will I see agention and fer them as liberty. This faid, he commanded the more to be called of four core or the reshour of the principal of the youth: and as exert one of them subjected to misusucipe clube part his individual and the next sight following, murdered them every one. After this, certain lines (their neverbey who ever of old time were the Burghers and Villagers, a kind of peakants and country kerns) were accuded to have. intended to file unto the enemy and to band with him, who like wie were whipped & fromged throughout all the freete and then put to death. By the featulk example of this crucky, stick out.

B rages of the common loss were well cooled and abated, jea; and fo altonied; that they dealt now once querch nor give attempt of any new designments tending to change and alteration. His forces he kept within his firength and places of defence, for neither thought he himfelfe ftrongenough to enter the field and fight a let battell, nor durit abandon the City, leeing the minds of men to wavering, and their affections to unconstant,

Quinting having made his provision and for all things in good order, departed from his standing camp, and the second day came to Sellacia upon the river Ocean: in which very place Antigonus fometime King of the Macedonian truck a battell (men fay) with Cleomenes the tyrant of the Lacedamonians. And there, having intelligence, that from thence he was to mount up in hard afcent and narrow paffage, he fet a thort compais through the mountains, having fent beione

C certain men to levell the ground and make the way even, and (0 got into a large and broad postgate, untill he came to the river Eurosas, which tunneth in manner hard under the walls of the City of Sparta: where, as the Romans were pitching their tents, even as Quintin himself with the horfemen and light van-courriers gone before, the Auxiliaries of the tyrant charged upon them: who looking for nothing lefs, because no man had encountred shem all the way as they marched, but passed on in their journey as in a peaceable country, were much troubled and affrighted herewith. This fear of theirs continued a good time, while the horfemen called upon the footnen, and they again unto the horfemen; and both the one fort and the other trafted in themselves but little or nothing at all. At length the standards of the legions with their enignecame forward;

and were within light, and so loon as the companies of the vanguard advanced forth to fight, D they who crewhile terrified others, were driven infearfull hafte themselves into the City. The Romans being retired to far from the wall, as that they were without dast-shot, stood a while ranged in battellarray. But after that they faw none of the enemies come abroad against them, returned to their leaguer. The next day after Quintine took his way and marched with his army in order of battell along the town fide, near unto the river, hard at the foot of the hill Manulus. The companies of the legionary footmen lad the march in the varguard, the light footmen and the hortemen followed in the rereward, and flanked the rest, Natio kept within the walls his mercenary fouldiers (in whom he reposed greatest confidence) arranged under their ensigns, and in readines to fight, purposing to charge the back of his enemies, And the rereguard of the Romans was not fo foon passed by, but they tallied out of the town at fundry places at once, with as tumul-E thous a noise as they made the day before, Appin Claudius had the leading of the sereward who having prepared beforehand the hearts of his fouldiers, and advertized them to be prest and ready for what occurrent foever might happen prefently turned the enfigns, and fer a compals with the whole army to make head against the enemies. Whereupon there ensued a hot fight which endured a good time, as if two armies had directly encounted one another. In the end, the fooldiers of Natio began to give ground and file: in which flight of theirs they had made less haft, and better lived themselves, but that the Achaens who were acquainted well with the ground and knew the coasts of the country, hotly followed the chaie: these made a foul slaughter and butchery amang them and the most part, such as were dispersed here and there in their flight, they disarmed, Then Quarius encamped seas unto Amyela, and having harried and washed all the rersinory round about the City (which places were very well peopled and very pleafant;) when he faw no enemie filtee out at the City gates, he removed his camp hard to the river Editor. From whence he made excursions, wasted all the vale lying under the hill I digitar, and the lands butting and adjoyning close to the sea.

Much about the same time L. Quintins made himself Master of the towns, situat on the sea fide: fome yielded willingly, ochera for fear or parforce. And being afterwards advertised, that the town Gyabaum ferved for a place of fafe retreat and refuge unso the Lacedemonians in all their exploits and fartice at fast, and that the Romans lay encapped not fartion the fea fide; he refolected affail it with all forcible means. This town as that sine was very flrong, twell peopled with Culture and other inhabitanes, and influencely furnished with all war like provise on and municion. G And invest good time is fellows, that as Quintain was covered into this difficult exceptife, King Emmarship the Rhodisa floor arrived. A mighty number of mariners and fea-fervieors, gathered out of these Armadocs, which is few dates made and furnished all engine and fabricks, which is the control of the weeren allant, a City to wel-fortified both by fea and land. Now was the cown-wall broken down with the agermining of the cortuents, now weathe wall thaken by the puth of the term, and with all these was one tower that by continual bastery was overshown, and with the fall thereof ill

He was no looser discovered with an army arranged in battell array from the brow and top of the hill that is now far diffant from the rowns whiles E. Quinting withill from another fide followed the affault with his ordnance and artillery both by lea and land but Gorgonas then began himfelt to despair in very deed, and was driven perforce to take that very course, which in another he had punished by death: and upon composition that he might depart and have away with him those souldiers which he had in garrison he delivered up the City to Quintius. Before that Greehoum was rendered, Pythagoras lefters Captain at Argos, leaving the guard and idefence of the City unto the charge of Timogrates of Tellena, came with a thousand waged fouldierstand two thouland Argives anto Nabis at Lacedamon, And Nabis like as at the first arrivall of the Roman fleet, and the furrender withall of the towns Randing by the fea fide, was much affrighted so he hast recovered again some little hope and was well quieted in mind, to long as Gy-K thems held out fill 3chis garrilon within the town kept their own. But after he heard once that it also was yielded uncothe Romans, and lost; seeing no hope left by land side, which was wholly possessed by the enemies, and that he was altogether thut up from the lea, he thought it best to vield unto fortune; And first he sent an herald into the camp to know whether the enemies would permit and luffer him to fend his Embaffadors unto them. Which being granted, Pythagoras teoriged unto the Generall with no other charge and commission, but only to request that thety-Tane might part with the Roman Generall. Hereupon the Council was affembled and generally cipined it was that there should be granted unto him a conference; infomuch, as both time and plane was agreed upon and appointed. Now when they were come to the hils flanding in the midit of that quarter with fome that companies of fouldiers arrending on either fide ipon them: L. they left their cohorts behind them, standing in guard, within the open view and fight of both pares: and then Nalis came down with a certain chosen guard for his body; and Quintius accompanied with his brother, Eumones the King, Sobilans the Rhodian and Arifthenus the Prator of the Achans with fome few Knight Marshals and Colonels. And then the tyring being put to bis choice, whether he would fpeak first, or hear another, began his speech in this wife.

The Orstion of Nabus

If I could have bethought my fell O Quinting and you all that are here prefent) & imagined what the cause should be that you either proclaimed or made war first against me. I would have grantended the iffue of my fortune with filence. But now I could not have that Maftery and comsignated of my felf to forbear, but that before I periff, I would needs know the reason and cause 66 of my ruin and overthrow. Surely if ye were such men as the Carthaginians are reported to be M We with whom there is no regard of truth, no trust and security in covenants of society and alli-Sance II would not then marvell at all if you made finall reckoning, & cared but little what mea-"fine ve offered unto me, Buchow, when I behold and advise you well, I see you are Romans, S' whose manner is to entertain most duly and precisely the observation of holy rites & divine Re-"ligion, and the faithful keeping of human league and alliance. When I confider and look into my felf. I hope and think verily that I am one, with whom in generall, as well as with the reft of the 4. Lacedamonians ye are linked by vertue of a most ancient league; and in particular regard of my Melfia privat amity and fociety hath been lately renewed by the war with Philip. But peradvenstere some man will say, That I have broken and overthrown the same first, in that I hold the Ci-"ty of the Argives, And how thall I be able to answer this, and excuse my felf? Shall I plead to the N " fubiliance of the matter or to the circumstance of the time? The thing it self presenteth unto me #2 swofold plea for my defence. For being called by the inhabitants themselves of the City, who " offered the town unto me I received it at their hands, and in no wife feized upon it by force: I Sreceived it, I say, when it sided and took part with Philip, before it was compriled within your "league. As for the time it justifieth and cleareth me also and my doings. For even then when as I " was poffessed of Argos, I was allied and associat with you in good accord; and in our covenants, we articled and capitulated to fend aids unto you for your wars, and not to withdraw the gar-"rifon from Argos, And verily, in this difference and question about Argos, I have the vantage as well in regard of the equity of the fact (in that I received a City not of yours but of your ene-"mies received it I lay not surprised by force, but offred and delivered willingly) as also by your O " own confession, for that in the conditions of the association agreed between us, ye left Argos "free unto me. " and killed more Roman Citizens than Philip himself, And the whole sea-coast of Macedon hath "less insested our ships that use to bring provision unto our armies, and been more safe for passage than the promo ntory & cape of Malea. Do you forbear therefore to make fuch yount of fideli-" lity: spare you of all other, to speak of the rights of alliance; and laying off the mask of popular " language and civil speech, talk as a tyrant and enemy as you are, Upon this, Aristonia dealt with Nabis, one while admonishing and advertising him another while requelling and entreating him, i now that the opportunity was offered, to provide for himself and his whole estate: he began to discourse unto him of the Tyrants of all the states confining thereabout one after another by name, who when they had refigned up and laid down their absolute soveraignty of command. and restored liberty to their subjects, passed their old age among their Citizens, not only in repose and security, but also in great honour and reputation. These words uttered & heard between them to and fro the night drew on space & parted the conference. The morrow after, Nabis promiled leeing the Romans would have it fo, to quit the City Argos, to withdraw his garrison from thence, and to deliver again all the captives and jugitive traitors that were under his hands : and if they demanded any more of him, he requested that they would set it down in writing, that he might confult thereof with his friends. So, both the Tyrant had respit and time granted to take ad- g vice, and also Quinting face in Councill with the principall heads of his allies what to do. The most part were of opinion to maintain the war still, and to kill the tyrant out of the way; for never would the liberty of Greece be otherwise firm and fure: and better far had it been, never to have entred into arms with him than being once begun, to give it over. And he will, fav they, be greater and more strong hereaster, as if his tyrannicall government were approved, and no doubt he would vouch the people of Rome for author of his unjust rule and dominion, and will induce and incice by his example many in other free States and Cities, to lie in wait to work means to overthrow the liberty of Cirizens, and to bring them into thraldom and bondage. The Generall, of himself was more affected and inclined to peace: for he saw, "that if the enemy were once diwen within the walls, there was no way but to lie in fiege against the City, and that would re-L. " ruire long tract of time: for a fouch as it was not Gyetheum (and yet that was betraied and rened dred and not forced by affault) but Lacedamon, a most strong town both for men and municion of that they were to lay fiege unto and affault. And whereas the only hope was that whenthey Le approached with the army, there might some diffention and sedition have risen among them-"felves within: now when as they faw the enfigns in manner advanced hard to the City gates, "there was not one that mutined or flirred at all. He added moreover and faid. That Villing the "Embaffador newly returned from Antiochus, reported, how all was not found there, nor the " peace like to continue : and that he had passed over into Europe with far greater forces both for siland and at lea than at any time heretofore: and if (quoth he) the army should be wholly emof ploved in the fiege of Lacedamon, what other power have we to maintain war withall against M 6 fo puillant and mighty a Prince as is Antiochus? These were the remonstrances that openly he gave out; but secretly he was troubled in mind for fear lest a new Conful should come in his place, and have the government of the Province of Greece: and so he should leave unto his successour, the honour of the victory of a war commenced by him, and in good forwardness. But when he perceived that his allies were nothing inclined to his waies, notwithflanding all his contradiction and bending to the contrary, by making semblant that he now drew with them and was of their mind, he won them all to approve his designment and intention. "Well, God speed our "hand (quoth he:) let us besiege Lacedemon fince ye will needs have it so: but considering that "the laying fiege unto Cities, is a thing as ye well know, that goeth fo flowly forward, and ofse tentimes maketh the affailants fooner weary than the defendants : you ought even now to cast N this account prefently with your felves, that we must lie all winter long about the walls of Lac damon. And were there nothing but travell and perill, that during folong rime we were "to endure, I would exhort and encourage you to fuffer and abide the same, with stour bodies and resolute minds. But besides all that, we must be at great cost and expences about fabricks, "enoing, and instruments of artillery, requisit to the assault of so great a City: we must I say be " provided of victuals good store against winter, as well to serve us as you. Bewell advised " therefore to the end that you should not suddenly in haste huddle up these matters, or after ye "are once entred into the action, give over and abandon it with fhame) that yedifpatch of your letters aforehand every one to the State wherein he liveth, and found them to the depth, " how their hearts ferve them and what firength and forces they have. Of aids & fuccours I have O "enough and to spare: but the more in number we are the more maintenance shall we need. At "this time the territory of our enemies hath nothing but bare foile and naked ground: and withall, the winter is coming on space, all which featon, carriage (especially far off) is cum-"brons and hard. This Oration at the first caused them every one to regard and look homeward to domesticall difficulties and inconveniences, namely, the idleness, the envy and backbiring of those which carry at home, against them that are employed in warrant : the common liberty

A (which causeth men of one fociety and commonalty hardly to accord and fort together) the bublike want of treasure and the riggardice of private persons, when they are to part with any thing out of their own purses. And therefore suddenly changing their minds, they put to the discretion of the Roman Generall, to do and determine what he thought expedient for the good of the people of Rome and their allies. Whereupon Quintim taking the advice only of his own Lieutepeople of Agent Mathals, engroffed these Articles and conditions following, according to which peace should be concluded with the Tyrant. Imprimis, That there be a truce made for the term of fix months between Nabie and the Romans, King Eumenes and the Rhogians, Item, That both T. Quintins and Nabis should immediatly send Embassadors to Rome, that the peace might be ratified and confirmed by the authority of the Senat, Item, That from that day forward, where-B in the conditions put, down in writing should be presented unto Nabis, the truce aforesaid should begin. Item, That within ten dates next after ensuing, all the garrisons quit Argos and the rest of the towns within the territory of the Argives : and then those peeces to be delivered void and free unto the Romans. Item, That no flave taken captive in wars, belonging either to the King, or to any publike state, or private person, be had away from those towns: and if any before time had been carried forth, they should be restored again duly to their right Masters. Item, That Nation (hould deliver again shole ships that he had gotten from the maritime Cities, and that himself have no vessell at all but only two gallions, and those to have no more than fix and twenty oars apiece to direct and rule them. Item, That he render all the runagate Traitors and captives unto all the Cities confederate with the people of Rome, as also make reflitution to C the Messenians of all their goods again, that either could be found, or the owners know certainly to be theirs. Item, That he restore to all the banished Lacedamonians their wives and children; but of the wives, fo many only as would be content to follow their husbands: and that none of them should be compelled against their wills to go with any exiled person. Item, That to as many mercenary fouldiers of Nabis, as were either gone from him into their own Cities or to the Romans, all their own goods should be justly and truly delivered again. Item, That in the Mand of Gree he should not be possessed of any one City: and look what Cities he then held, he yield them to the Romans. Item, That he enter into alliance with no Candiot, nor with any other whatfoever, no myet make war with them: Items, That he remove all the garrifons out of all the Cities that himself had delivered up and which had surrendred themselves and all they had, under D the protection and obedience of the people of Rome, and not molett them neither by himfelf nor any of, his. Item, That he build no town nor Castle, either in his own land or in any other, Item, That for the more affurance of performing these covenants, he give five hostages, such as it should please the Roman Generall to choose; and namely, his own son for one of theme Last of all, That he make present paiment of one hundred talents of filver, and fifty more yearly until the term of eight years be run out. These Articles engrossed, were sent to Lacedamon, after the Camp was removed nearer to the City. But nothing well pleated was the tyrant with any of them, Only he was well apaid, that beyond his hope and expectation, there was no mention at all therein of reducing the exiled persons home into the City. But that which offended and displeased him most was this, that both shipping was taken from him, and also the maritime E port towns: for great commodity he gat by the fea. in fouring the coast from the cape of Malea with his pyrats and men of war a and besides, the youth and able men of those Cities, served his turn very well to furnish and man his ships with the very best souldiers and men of service that were. And albeit he scanned and considered upon these articles in great secrecy with his friends, yet were they all of them divulged abroad and current in every mans mouth: fo vain are thefe courriers commonly and hardly to be trufted, as in all things elfe so especially in keeping of secret countell, These conditions were controlled and found sault with, not to much by all men in generall, 44 by each one in particular, as they took exceptions against those points that touched and concerned themselves. They that had married the wives of the banished, or were possessed of anypart of their substance, chased, and stormed thereat, as if they were to lose and sorgotheir E own, and not to tender and reftore the goods of others. The flaves who had been freed by the tyranis, were now not only to loe the benefit of that freedom, but alto to endure harder ferriude and bondage than aforetime; fetting before their eyes how they should return again into the honles and hands of their old Masters, angry and incented now against them. The hired fouldiers were male content, for that they faw they should lose their pay after peace concluded: and law full well, that there was no being for them in those States and Cities, who hated the syrants themselves no more than their followers and attendants. At first they muttered murmured, whileering these things among themselves in their secret meetings and conventicles; afterwards they mutined, and on a fudden ran and took arms. The Tyrant feeing the multitude disquieted enough of themselves with this tumble, affembled the peopleto-

And that every man for his own part (as the ulual manner is of a multitude, when they are H together) should take a good heart, and hope the best, saying that Fortune savoureth Fortunde The syrant incited with thefe their words teconded them himself & affired them that Antible and the Atolians would take their parts and affift them and if they did not yet were they fitting enough of themseives, and had sufficient means to endure the fiege. No more talking now nor thinking of peace, but every man was ready to run in haltso his teverall quarrer, and thand prom their own guard, without any rest or repose from thenceforth. The Romans to soon as they faw fome few of them to fally out of the City, and to discharge their darts among them, were foon nor out of all donbe, that no other remedy there was, but they must to war again. After this, there pasfed certain light skirmishes four daies together, at first without any assured iffue of good freed either of the one part or the other: but the fift day after one conflict fought immanner almost of a I fer battell, certain Roman fouldiers following the chase upon their enemies, and killing them in their flight, entred the City at certain void places, where the wall was not united : for in that order were the walls built of that town in those dates. Quintim then verily, having well bridled and tamed by this terror his enemies for making any more excurtions, and supposing that there remained no more but luftily to go to an affault. fent out certain of purpose for to call the mariners & fea-fervitors from Gytt heum, whiles himfelf in person, accompanied with the Provost Marshals, rode about the walls to view the fituation of the City. This Sparta in times past stood without murage. And the tyrants of late daies had built walls against the open flats and plain fields. The higher ground and of harder access, they fortified with strong corps de guards of armed fouldiers. initead of bulwarks of defence. When Quimin had infliciently confidered every corner he iup- K posed there was no other way but to invest it round about, and thereupon with all his forces united (which being all together Roman Citizens and Latine allies toot and horse land-sonidiers and fea-fervitors one with another, amounted to 50000 fighting men) he compaffed and environed the City. Some brought icaling ladders, some fire, every man one thing or other; not only to give an affault, but also to terrifie and amaze them: with direction and express commandment, with a loud cry and shout at once in all places to approach the walls. & give the venture upon them ; to the end that the Lacedamonians affrighted at one infrant on every fide, might not know which way to turn them, and be to feek, where first to make head against the enemies, and in what place to come with succours. Having therefore divided the whole power of his arrhying three parts, he gave the one of them in charge to affail that quarter which was called Phiereum; I. a fecond likewile to fet upon that which is named Diffynneum, and the third to force the canton Henricoma; places alllying open and without a wall. The City being thus seized on all fides with fo great fear, the tyrant moved and troubled to hear those sudden outcries & fearful news brought unto him by halty meffengers: according as any place flood most in danger at the first either prefented himselt in proper person or else tent some to help; but afterwards feeing the feat to general, and no one place woid of danger he was to aftonied, that unable he was either himfelf to give good direction to others, or to hear theirs. So void was he, and disfurnished of advice and couniel yea, and bereft of his right wits and tenles. The Lacedamonians at first hand fustained the furions violence of the Romans in the narrow fireights and passages & at one time in diversiplaces. three armies fought on either fide:but afterwards as the heat of the fight encreafed the fervice was M nothing equal of both parties; for the Lacedamonians discharged that from which the Roman fouldiers eafily faved themselves, by means of their large targets, and withall much thereof either fell thornand befides, or elie to feebly flung from them, that little or no harm they could do. For by reason of the freightness of the place, and the multitude so thronged and thrust together they had not only no foace to take their run, when they should lance their datts ? the best means of all other to enforce them but not fo much as fure footing, and at ease to drive and level them with all their Brength, Infomuch, as of all the darts and javelins which were directly that afrong them. none at all pierced to their bodies & very few fo much as fluck in their bucklers. Mary forme hapned to be wounded from the higher places, by those that stood near unto them, and about their fides. And anon as they advanced forward they chanced to be hurt, not only with arrows & darts N from off the houses, but also with tiles and flates ere they were aware. But afterwards, they covered their heads with their targets which they fet fo close united together one under the other. featherwise, that not only there was no place of entrance for the darts thrown and call at random afar, no, nor fo much as any room for a weapon to get between, levelled though it were, and simed near at hand; fo as under this target-fence they approached nearer and mearer in fafety. At the first the narrow and straight passages filled with the throng both of themelves and also of the enemies to thrust and crouded together, staid them for a while; but afterwards, when they had by little and little gathered upon the enemies, and put them back, and were come into a larger and more spacious street of the City, then their force and violence could not possibly be endured any longer. Now when she Lacedamonians turned their backs, and fled apaceto gain Q the higher places for their vantage. Nabis verily for his part trembling and quaking as if the Cisy had been quite loft, looked about him on every fide, which way himfelf might escape and fave his life. But Pythagoras as in all things elfe he performed the devoir and part of a consagious Captain, so he was the only cause that the town was not lost: for he commanded to set fire on the houses standing next to the wall, which in the minute of an hour burned out on a light state, as being fer forward by the help of those, who otherwise were wont to anearth the like carefites:

And therefore, as well those Romans who were wirthout the City in the hottest of their affault; retreited from the walls; as also these that were entred already; for feet left by the fire behind them they thom the same the same that th caused to sound the retreat and so being retailed they returned out of the City which they had as good as wan into the camp And Quintins conceiving more hope by the fear of the enemies, than of the thing is self and the service done, never gave over for three daies to terrific them partly by skirmilibing, and partly by interenching and Hopping up certain quarters, that they might have no B paffage as all to fly and shift for themselves. The tyram constrained at length with these dangers menaced sent: Pythagoras again as an Orator unto Quantins, But he at first rejected him, and commanded him to avant out of the camp : yet in the end, after he had made most humble supplication on, and cast himself prostrate at his seet; he gave him audience. The beginning of his speech was this, that he yielded all to the discretion and former award of the Romans. But seeing that he gained nothing thereby, and that his words took no effect, they grew at length to this point, That upon the same capitulations which few daies before were exhibited up in writing, a time should bemade, and hereupon was both the money and also the hostages received. Whiles the tyrant was befreged and affaired, there came post upon post to Argos, that Lacedemon was at the point of being loft: whereupon the Argives took such heart and courage dato C them (by reason that Pythageras with the best part of the gertison souldiers was departed before out of their town) that contemning the imal number which remained in their fortrefs, under the leading of one Archippus, they expelled the reft of the garrison. As for Timocrates of Pellene their Captain, because he had behaved himself in his charge and government gently and mildly, they fent him away alive with fafe conduct. At the very inftant of this joyfull occurrent, T. Quinrius arrived after he had granted peace to the tyrant and sent away from Eucedenion, Eumenis and the Rhodians, together with L. Quintin his brother to the fleet. The City of Argain great joy proclaimed the celebration of their most folemn feast, and those so famous and renowned games and pastimes called Nomes, against the coming of the Roman army and their Generall, which they had forelet upon the ordinary time and day, by occasion of the troubles of war. And for the D honour of Quintins, they ordained him to be the overfeer of these folcamities. Many things there were to redouble and increase this their foy and solace to the full. The Citizens were reduced from Lacedemon whom Pythagorus of late and Wabis aforetime had carried away. They allo were returned home again who had fled and escaped, after the conspiracy of Pythagoras was detected, and the massacrebegun. Now they saw their liberty again, whereof they had lost the light a long time: now they beheld the Romans the authors thereof, and who for their lakes were induced to take arms and enterprise the war with the tyrant. Also, months very day of the Nemeangames, the liberty of the Argives was published and proclaimed by the voice of the publike beadle and crier of the City. For now the people of Rome was become a pensioner to guard the body of depasted to the Spatian war. Some write, that the tyrant when he sought with the Romans, came F Roman camp; and elistastier he had made good a long time, expecting the aid of the Etolians, and purveyors of his camp: in which battell he was vanquished and beaten out of the field, and can danger.

Af one and the fame time in a manner were letters brought both from T. Quintins touching the affairs archieved it. Lacedomon, and allo from M. Povens the Conful out of Spain. And by order from the States, there was genered in the name of either of them a folemn proceffion to can the defeat of the fill Roissas about the forest of Litans, returned to Rome against legislaters, and created Confuls, P. In the beginning of this yest, wherein P. Seipin Africante was Control the fecond time with Sampranius Longue, two Emballadors of Nahis the typest arrived at Bones, For to give them and ence, the Senat aftembled together without the City in the Temple of Apollo. Their petition was. That the peace agreed upon with Quint in might be maified: and their fair was gramed. When in was moved, as touching the government of the Provinces; the Senat (affembled in great frequency) were all of this opinion. That for almuch as in Spain and Macadony the war was ended. both Confuls thould have the government of Italy Scipie was of advice. That one Confut was infficient for Italy, and that the other should be employed in Macedony. And why? these was truell r was menaced from King Antiochus: himself already was passed over into Europe " And what think ye, quoth he will he then do, when the Etolians (who doubtless are enemies) of opende shall follicit and call upon him for to war, and Annibal, a warriour and commander to renowned for the defeats and overthrows of the Romans, shall prick him forward of the other? Whilesthey debated thus about the Provinces of the Confuls, the Prestors call loss for their feverall governments. The City instidiction fell to Cn. Domition, the fortainto T. Juventius. To P. Cornelius the far. ther Spain was allotted, and the hither to Sen. Degiting Cn. Corneline Blafe had Sicily affigned unto him, and Merenda was charged with Sardinia. It was not thought good that a new army should be transported over into Macedony, But concluded it was, that the army there should be brought back by Quintius into Italy. Scalikharged, Item, That that the army likewise should be case of fed, which had ferred under M. Persius Caro in Spain, Irem, That both Confuls front govern Italy, and levy two legions of Citizens to go thither, that when thole forces were dismissed and licenfed to go home, which it pleased the Senat to set at liberty, there should be eight Roman legions

In the former year, when M. Porcius and L. Kalerius were Confuls, there had been held a forlemnity of a facred Spring. But when P. Lieinius the high Pontifies made report first to the Col-ledge of the Priests, and by the advice and authority of that Colledge, unto the LL of the Conncill. That there was some errour committed, and that it was not performed accordingly: the Senarors ordained, that is flould be done again anew, according to the diference and direction of the Pontifees aforefaid. Also that the great Roman Plaies, which cogether with that Spring were L. yowed, should be exhibited with the accustomed cost and expences: And that all youngestrell that fell between the Calends of March, and the last day of April, in that year wherein P. Comel, Scipio and T Sempronius Langus were Consuls, should be accounted as confectated for that lacred Spring above-named. After this, there was an affembly held for the choofing of Confors. wherein were created Sex. Elius Parasand C. Cornelius Cetherus: who cheched P. Scipiothe Conful. Prefident of the Senat, like as the Ceptors before them had done. In the furvey and review of the whole Senar they left out and discarded three only, and none of them who had born office of State, and fat in the Ivory chair. Great love these Cenfors won amonast them of that calling and equality, in giving commandment to the Ædiles curule, that at the Roman sames and plaies they should let out places apart from the rest of the people for the Senators to behold the faid M disports. For aforetime they beheld the sports and passimes all together, without regard and diflinction. Few also of the Gentlemen or Knights of Rame had their horses of service sakenfrom them: and rigorously dealt they with no estate and degree. The porch of Liberry, and the hamlet called Villa publica, were by them repaired and enlarged. The facred Spring was celebrate; and the games vowed by Se. v. Sulpitius the Conful, were by them exhibited. And whiles all men were amused and their minds occupied the reupon, Q. Pleminius who had been cast in prison for divers and fundry outrages committed at Locris, to the great offence of God and man, had procured certain per ons, who in the night lealon at one instant should set on fire many places of the City, to the end that whiles all the people were affrighted in this night-tumule, he might break prison and cicape. This complor was discovered and reported to the Senat by some of them that N were prive and accessary thereunto, And Pleminius was let down into a lower dungeon and there killed.

That year were certain Colonies of Roman Citizens conducted to Butcoli, Fultur mum, and Blternum, and three hundred men planted in each of them. Likewife Coloners of Roman Chi zens were brought to Salernum and Buxentum. The Triumvirs who had the placing of them were T. Sem pronius Longus, Conful for the time being , M. Servilius and Q. Minmins Therme. The territory of the Campans was divided among them. Three other also deputed for the like parpole, D. Junius Brutus, M. Babius Tamphilus, and M. Helmus, placed a Colony of Roman Chipmes in Sepontage to enjoy the lands of the Arpins, Likewife other Colonies of Roman Civiana were plinted in Tempfa and Crotone. The lands belonging to Timpfa were woon from the Brush O who had expelled the Greeks: and the Greeks remained in Crocone. The Triumvire for Greene were Cn. Offevius, L. Amylus Paulus, and C. Rieserius: and for Temple L. Cornet, Moralli, and C. Salanius, Alfo that year were feen at Rome divers wonders and pooling to the figure and form were reported from other parts. In the common place place, in the publike Hall, Comitium, and Capital, were teen certain drops of bloud. And oftensimes in rained certain. The band of Fallow was fire. News came that at International there was a fiream of milk. Also that at Annual there

A were two Infants both of free condition, born without eyes and note, and another in the Picene country handless and footless. These strange tokens were by order given from the chief Pontifiees, looked unto and explated, and a Novendiall facrifice continued for nine daies, because the Adrians brought word that in their territory it rained flones.

In Gaul pear to Mediolanum, L. Valerius Flaccus the Pro-Conful, fought a fet field with the French Insubrians and Boians, Which Boians under the conduct of Dorulacus passed over the river Padas, for to follicit and raife the Insubrians. In which conflict were slain ten thousand enemies. About the same time his Collegue in government M. Percins Cato triumphed over Spain. In this triumph he carried in pomp and shew 25000 pound weight of silver in bullion, and in coin 122000 Bigat pieces: of Oican filver 540 pound weight, and of gold 400000 pound weight. Of R the booty won from the enemies he dealt among his fouldiers that were footmen 270 affes apiece, and trebble fo much to every man of arms. T. Sempronius the Conful having put himself in his journey toward his Province, led first his legions into the Boians country, Boiorix at that time their Prince with his two brethren, having raised the whole nation to rebellion encamped in certain commodious places: lo as it appeared that if the enemy entred their confines, they were ready to give him battell. The Conful perceiving how strong and consident the enemies were, dispatched a courrier to his Collegue, to make half if he thought 10 good and come unto him: for untill his coming he would fall off, feen to retire and not fight. But the same cause that moved the Consul to stay, gave occasion to the Gauls to make more hafter for befides that the delaying & lingring of the Conful, encouraged the C enemies, they were defirous to have the triall of a battell before the forces of both Confuls were joyned together. Howbeit, for two daies space they did nothing but sland ready ranged for fight, if any should come forth to brave and dare them. On the third day they approached the trench and rumpier of the Confuls Camp, and on every fide at once gave the affault. The Conful immediatly commanded the fouldiers to arm. And when they were armed, he kept them in awhile, with intent to encrease the foolish confidence in the enemies, and to dispose of his own forces, and give direction, what companies should fally out at every gate. The two legions he commanded to iffue forth under their colours at the two fide gates called Principales: but in the very passage without the Gauls stood thick and made head again, so that the way was stopped up. A long time they fought in thosevery straights. And they bestirred themselves no more D with their hands and fwords, than they pressed one upon another with their bodies and targets:

whilesthe Romans strived to advance their enligns out of the gates, and the Gauls endeavoured no less, either to enter themselves within the camp, or elle to impeach the Romans for going forth. But in this conflict there was nothing between them either won or loft, no ground gained the one of the other, before that Q. Victorius a principall Centurion of the Pilani in the fecond legion, and C. Atinins, a Tribune or Marshall of the fourth, caught the banners from the enfign-bearers (a thing often practifed in time of extremity) and flung them among the enemies. For whiles these laboured and strained themselves to recovereach one a banner, they of the fecond legion first brake through and got forth of the gate; so as now, they maintained skirmish without the trench, and the fourth legion fluck fill in the gap. By which time there E arose another sumult and noise in the contrary side of the camp: for the Gauls were broken in at the Quartors gate (or the gate against the "Questorium") and slain those that valiantly "The quarter made head and held them play; to wit, Lucius Posthumius a treasurer surnamed Tympanus, and lodging Marcus Asinius and Publius Sempronius two Colonels of the allies, and well near two hundred of the Treatefouldiers besides. Thus the camp on that part was won, untill such time as one extraordina-rer. ry cohort was sent from the Consul to defend the Quartors gate aforesaid: which either slew thole that were within the rampier, or elie drave them forth, and so withstood those that would have, rushed in. And much about that very time the fourth legion also with two extraordinary squadrons brake forth at the gate. Thus at once there were three severall battels in fundry places about the camp: and the diffonant cries and noifes (according to the divers oc-F casions of each party ministred by their sellows) turned and withdrew the minds and spirits of those that were in fight; from the present skirmish before them. In this manner maintained they the right sill moon requally matched in a rength and number, and little or no odds between them for hope of victory : but tedious travell and extremity of hear compelled the Gauls (whose bodies are lost and open, and soon running to sweat, and who of all other things can least away with thirth) to abandon the battelle and those few that remained behind, the Romans ran upon, suffied their colours, and chafed them into their own hold. Then the Conful founded the terretariat which figurall given the most part retired themselves; but a fort of them, upon a hor desire of fight, and good hope to be Masters of their camp, persitted fill, close to their trench. The Gally affiding their small number issued all forth out of their Camp: and then the Ro-man begally affiding their small number issued all forth out of their Camp: and then the Ro-G man begalliconfued, were glad now of themselves for fear and right to crudge unto the strength of their own hold, which they would not retire unto at the commandment of the

howbeit, when all cards were told and the reckoning made, the Gauls had the worlt of the same: for of them were flain eleverthousand, whereas of Romans there died but five thouand Then the Gull seried chemicives into the most inward parts of their country, and the Conful marched with his legions to Placemia. Some write, that Scipio and his Collegue with this joynt forces, invaded and spoiled the countries of the Boians and Ligarisms, so fat forth H as they could pass for woods and bogs a others again record, that he having done no memorable exploit at all returned to Rome about the affembly for election of Confals.

The same year T. Quintins spent the whole winter season at Elasia (whither he had retired his forces for winter harbour) in hearing mens causes and ministring justice to every one; also in reforming and redressing all such disorders as had passed in the States and Cities, through the licentions government and jurisdiction either of Philip himself or his Captains, whiles he advanced those favourits of his own faction, and put down the right and liberty of others. In the beginning of the fpring he came to Corinth, where he had given fummons, that there should be holden a general Diet of the States. There in the affembly of all the Embaffadors and agents from the Cities, gathered about him as it were to hear an Oration, he made a speech unto them; beginning I first with the amity contracted between the Romans and Greece: and proceeding to the acts archieved in Spain by the General's afore him, and those also of his own. All that he spake was heard and received with great applause, untill he touched the point concerning Nabis: for it was generally thought unfitting, that he undertaking to fet all Greece at liberty, had left a tyrant (not only a grievous oppressour of his own subjects, but also dangerous to all the Cities about him) to remain still as a learful malady feeled in the very bowels and heart of a most noble and renowned State. Quintius, not ignorant of their affections and dispositions, confessed, that he should not indeed have any ear at all to the motion or mention of peace with the tyrant, in case that Lacedsmon could have stood in safety without so doing: but now since that Nabis might not possible be confounded and overthrown, without the present ruin and fearfull downfall of the City, he K "thought it a better course in policy to leave the tyrant enfeebled and disfurnished of all means "to offend and hurt any man, than to suffer so goodly a City to die in the cure, and under the " hand as it were of the Phylician, amidit those quick and sharp remedies which it were never a-" ble to eudure: and to in feeking to recover liberty, to perish and die for ever. And after he had "discoursed of things past, he interred, that his purpose and intent was, to go into Iraly, and to "have away with him his whole army : also that within ten daies they should hear news how all "the garrifons had quit Demetrias and Chalcie: and that he would deliver out of hand unto the "Achaans in their very fight, the fortress of Govinth: that all the world may know, whether it be "the Romans guise, or the fashion of the Ætolians, to over-reach and lie; who in their common " talk have not let to discourse, to fow surmises, and to buzze into mens heads, that it was dan-1. et gerous for Greece to put their liberty into the Romans hands : & that they had but made an exchange of their lordly rulers, admitting the Romans in lieu of the Macedonians. But as for them "(quoth he) their tongue is no flander, being fuch persons as never took heed and made regard "what either they did or faid. But the other Cities he advertised to weigh their friends by deeds stid not by words: to be wife and well advised whom they are to true, and whom they are to " beware of: to me their liberty in measure and moderation; which if it be well tempered and "qualified, is good and wholfome to particular persons and generall States: but excessive if it be. "it would not only be grievous and unsupportable to others, but also unruly, dangerous, and per-" nicious to themielves that have it. He gave them counsell, that the Princes and States in each "City should maintain concord not only among themselves, but also with all other in one com-M "munity: for fo long as they accord and agree together, no King nor tyrant should be strong e-" nough for them: whereas discord and fedition maketh overnue and openeth easie way to ene-" mies that lie in wair for the vantage sconfidering, that the fide which in civil contention is the " weaker and goeth to the walls, will band rather with a forrainer, than give place and floop to a Citizen. In conclusion, he advised them, to keep and preserve by their carefull regard, this their 14 liberry purchased for them by forrain forces, and delivered unto them with faithfull fecurity of of ftrangers and aliens; that the people of Rome might fee, that they have given freedom to well "deferving people: and this their great benefit hath been well bestowed upon worthy persons, Whiles they hearkned to these sage admonitions as uttered out of the mouth of a very father the tears gushed plenteonsly out of their eyes for kind heart and joy; insomuch as they troubled him in the delivery of the rest of his speech. For a while there was a plantible noise heard among N them as they approved his words, and advited one another to ponder thele lage layings, and to imprint them deeply in their hearts, proceeding as it were from divine oracle. After filence made, he requested them to seek up all those Roman Chizens (if haply there were any) who fived in service and lavery among them, and within two months to lend them much him into The fall; for it were a great ignominy and thame even for them that in their countries there though remain in bondage any of those, by whose means they themselves were set free and delivered our of bondage, With that, they all cried alond with one voice, That for this above all the reft they rendred thanks unto him, in that they were admonished and warned by him? to perform their devoir and duty (choneft fo religious, and to necessary. Now a mighty number there was of captives in the Punick war; such as Annibal (when their triends redeemed them not by ransome) had fold in open market. And how great the innlitude of them was, this may prove and testifie which the wrote another the management of the light of the place. Himlest went to the place, Himlest went to that place, Himlest went to Chalcie, and having withdrawn the garrifons not only from thence but also from Oreing and Erre-B tria, he held a general Councel there of all the cities of Endors : and after he had made remonfrance into them in what case he found them, and in what efface he left them, he dismissed the assembly. From thence he departed to Demarias, where also he removed the garrison, and being attended with a train of all the citizens, like as at Corinth and Chalcis before, he took his journey into The flatte: where the ciries were not only to be fer free, but also to be reformed, and from a general diforder and confusion wherein they food, to be recorded and framed into some tolerable order and form of government. For they were not only restrict and infected with the corruption of the times, and the violent current of licentious outrage, which had taken head under the government of the King; but also of an inbred troubletome future and humor of their own wherby, fince their first beginning and uprifing, even unto our dates they never held Parliaments, Electi-

C ons, Diets, Councels, or any other affemblies whatioever, without much trouble and fedition, the ons precision means and Judges there in regard especially of their wealth, and in all Cities he made that part more mighty, unto which it was more expedient and beneficial to have all quiet and in peace. Thus having vificed Theffalie, and taken a general review thereof, he came by the way of Epirus to Oricum, from whence he minded to cross the leas. From Oricum all his forces were transported to Brandussian, and so they passed forward throughout state to the City of Rome, in manner of triumph, sending before them as great a train of prizes by them taken, as they made themeleves in their march. After they were come to Rome, the Senar affembled without the City for Quinting, where he had audietice to declare and diffcourie of his worthy exploits: and willing they were to grant him triumph, according to his deferts. Three dates together he rode in D triumph. The first day he made a shew of all the atmoug 43 wel desensue as offensive, also of braicin and marble images, of which he had taken more from King Philip, than he found in the laccage of the ciries. The second day there was carried in pomp, the gold and silver both unwrought and wroughe into plate, yea, and cast into coin. Of alver unwrought there was 1 8000 pound weight ofwrought, 270 pound weight. Many veifels of plate of all fores, and most engraven, some of right curious and exquisit workmanship. Likewise brasen veifels, cunningly and artificially made: and besides, ten shields of silver, and in coin eighty four thousand Attick peeces of silver, which they call Terradrachma, weighing almost four Roman deniers apeece: of gold there was three thouland seven hundred and sourceen pound weight, and one shield full and whole of beaten gold: and of Philip golden peeces in coin, fourteen thousand five hundred and sourteen. The third

E day were born in view for a pageant, a hundred and fourteen coroners of gold, which were the preferms of Cities given unto him. Moreover, there were led that day the beafts for facrifice and before his charior went many noble priforers and hostages, and among them, Democrius, King Philip his fort, and Armenes the fon of Nabu the tyrant, a Lacedemonian both. Then rode, Quinting himfelf in a chariot into the City, and a great number of fouldiers followed after, by reason that his whole airmy was retired with him our of his province. To every sootman he gave two hundred and fitty Affes, duple as much to a centurion, and triple to an hotfeman. Those who were tedeented ont of captivity, followed his chariot with their heads shaves, and much beauti-

P. Scipio returned out of his Province and government of Gaul for the election of new Con- H fuls, and to that purpose was the general assembly summoned; wherein were chosen L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The next morrow after were created Pretors, L. Cornelius Scibio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Meffala, L. Porcius Licinius, and C. Flaminius C. Attilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo, Ediles of the chair, were the first that exhibited the Stage-plaies called. Megalefia. And the Roman plaies or games represented and set out by these Ediles, the Senat now first and never before beheld apart from the rest of the people. And this (as all novelties and new fashions) ministred much talk: whiles some gave their opinion and said. That now at length that was given to this most noble and honorable State, which long ago was due sothers again confirmed thus, and gave out, " That whatfoever was added to the Majefly of "the Senators and Nobles, was derogatory from the dignity of the people: and that all fuch kind I of diffinctions, whereby effaces and degrees are fevered one from another, are prejudicial as wel "to common peace as publick liberty. For these five hundred and eighty years say they, these places and games have been beheld and looked upon in common, without any such precise dif-"ference. What new accident is suddainly befaln, why the Nobles should not be willing to let "the Commons be intermingled with them in the Theatre? and why a rich man should dildain "his poor neighbour to fit by him? This is a new appetite and strange longing of theirs indeed, er full of pride and arrogancy, a thing never defired nor taken up and practifed by the Senat of any " nation whatfoever. So as in the end even Africanus beshrewed himself (men fay) and repented thereof, for that he in his Confulship moved and perswaded the bringing up of this new fashion. So hard a matter it is to alter an old custome, and make a new order to be well liked of, K And men are ever more willing to keep them to ancient customes, unless they be such as practice and experience do evidently check and condemn.

In the beginning of the year, wherein L. Cornelius and Q. Minutius were Confuls, news came for thick of many earth-quakes, that men were not only weary of the thing it self, but also of the holy-dayes and folemnities that were published and proclaimed in that regard. For the Confuls could not intend either to affemble the Senate and fit in Councel, or manage the affairs of the Common-weal, for being wholly emploied about facrificing and appearing the wrath of the gods, In conclusion, the Decemvirs were commanded to peruse the books of Sibylla, and according to their answer and direction, a procession and supplication was for three daies solemnised. And beforethe Altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses, they made their praiers with garlands and L coroners on their heads: yea, and commandment was given, that every houshold and family by ir felf should fallto their praiers and devotions. Also the Consuls by order from the Senat made proclamation, That upon what day a feast or solemnity was ordained by occasion of one earthquake, no man the same day should bring news of another. Then the Consuls cast lots for the government of their provinces, and after them the Pretors did the like. Unto Cornelius befell Caul, and to Minutius the Ligurians; C. Sempronsus had the charge of the civil jurisdiction, and M. Valerius of the forrain : L. Cornelius governed Sicily, L. Porcius Sardinia, C. Flaminius high Spain, and L. Fulvius the lower. The Contuls looked for no war that year: but even then at that instant were letters brought from M. Cincius Lord President of Pifa, which gave notice, that twenty thousand Ligurians were up marms, having conspired together in all market Towns and M places of refore throughout the whole nation, and that they had already wasted the territory of Luna, and having invaded and passed through the Pisan Land, had over-run also the Sea coasts, Wherefore Minutius the Conful, unto whom the government of Liguria was allotted, by the advice of the LL. of the Senat mounted up into the pulpit Refera, and published an act, That those two legions of Roman citizens, which the former year had been enrolled, should within ten daies present themselves at Arctium, in lieu whereof he would levy two other legions out of the City. Also he commanded the allies and Magistrats of the Latin nation, and their Embassadors leagers, who owed knight-service, and were bound to find souldiers to come before him into the Capitol. And from among them he enrolled fifteen thousand foot and five hundred horse, according, to the number of young and serviceable men that were to be found in each State which N done; he commanded them forthwith, to go directly from the Cepitol to the gate of the City, and presently to take musters that all might be done with greater expedition. Unto Fulvist and Flaminius were appointed three thousand Roman footmen and two hundred horsemen apeece, for to supply and firengthen their forces: also five thousand foot to either of them of allies of the Latin nation, with two hundred horse. Moreover the Pretors were charged to dismissand cass the old fouldiers, fo foon as they were arrived into their provinces. Now, when as the fouldiers who were enrolled in the City-legions, reforted thickunto the Tribuns of the Commons, that they should take knowledge of as many of them as were exempted from warfare, for that they either had served out their full time by law appointed or were fickly and diseased : behold the letters of Sempronius dashed all this, and cleered every difficulty and scrupulosity: wherein it was written, that fifteen thousand Ligurians were entred the territory of Placentia, and had made 0 great wast and laccage therein putting all to fire and sword as they went, even as far as to the very walls of the Colony it felf, and the banks of * Padur. Also that the nation of the Boil made countenance and gave suspicion of rebellion. In which related seeing there was a tumultuous and suddain was roward, the Senat passed a decree, wherein they signified that it was not their pleasure that the Tribuns should accept any excuses pretended by the souldiers, but that they should all

A meet and affemble together, according to the Edict. Over and besides they gave order, that the allies of the Latin nation, who had served in the armies of P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius, and were alics of the Latin Annual Property of the Members of the Latin Annual Property of the Latin Annual Prop gainst that day which L. Cornelius the Consul should appoint and at what place soever of Hernegainst that buy want of proclamation: Also that the said L. Cornelius the Consolin his march and journey toward the Province, might take up, enrol, and arme, what fouldiers he thought good, out of all the burroughs and villages in his way, and have them with him whither foever he would, yea, and have commission to dimits whom of them he thought good, and when

After that the Confuls had taken musters, and were gone into their Provinces, then T. Quin-B tim demanded to have a day of audience in the Senare concerning those affairs that he had conchided with the affiffance of the ten Delegats above faid: and that it would pleafe them to confirm and establish the same by vertue of their assent and authority. Which they might do with more case, in case they would hear the Embassadors themselves speak, who were come out of all Greece, a great part of Asia, and from the Kings. These embassis were admitted into the Senar by C. Scribonius the Pretor for the City, and all dispatched with a gratious answer. But because the dispute about Antiochus required long time of debate, therefore it was referred and put over to the ten Delegats, of whom some had been in Asia, or at Listmachia with the King. And Quintius was commanded, that together with those said Delegats he should hear what the King his Embassidors could say, and so return unto them such an answer, as might stand with the honor and welfare of the people of Rome. The chief of this embaffige from the King were Memppus and Heweitage of the people of come, a nether of this embanagement the king were company and tregenanae. Then Menippus began and faid, "That he knew no fuch perplexed difficulty in their
"embaffage, confidering they were come simply to treat for peace, and to contract a league and al-"liance, For, faith he, there are three forts of confederacies and affociations, whereby States and "KK, ordinarily conclude league and amity one with another. The first, when they that are van-"quished in war, have conditions and articles imposed upon them: for when all is yeelded into "the hands of him that is the mightier and more puillant, then it is in his power and at his dif-"cretion and will, to give unto the conquered party what he lift, or to take from him as he " pleaseth. The second is, when they that are equal in warlike forces give over on even hand, and be content to make peace and amity, upon indifferent and equal conditions, one with the other: D "in which case, demand and claim is made, reflitution and amends performed according to the "accord and agreement : and if in time of the wars, any have been molefled and troubled in their "possession, they fall to composition either by the form and tenor of ancient law, or respective to the good and profit of both parties. The third is, when they that never were enemies, meet and confer together about concluding some friendship, by way of solemn alliance and society, who neither give nor take any conditions: for that belongeth properly to Conquerors, and "those that are conquered. Seeing then that Antiochus is comprised in this last kind, I marvail "(qd, he) that the Romans should think or say. It is reasonable to tender articles unto him, or to prescribe and sectiown, what Cities of Agathey would have to be free and exempt, and "which they would have to be tributary: and into what Cities they would exprelly forbid the E King his garrifons, or the King himfelf to enter and fer foot. For in this wife ought they to make peace with Philip their enemy in times past, and not to draw a contract of amity and asso-"Ciation with Antiochus, a friend at this present. To this Oration Quintius shaped his answer in "this fort, "For a fmuch as it pleafeth you to make your speech thus diftinelly by way of divisi-« on, and leverally to reheric all kinds of confederacies and accords, I also will let down as metho-« dically in order two conditions, without which, you may let the King your mafter to understand, that he must not look to entertain any friendship with the people of Rome. The one is this, "that if he would debar us to intermeddle with the Cities of Afathe likewife himfelf have no-Ething to do with all Europe. The other, that if he cannot contain himself within the compass of Affabut will needs encroach upon it the Romans likewise may have liberty and power both to F "maintain those amities which they have already, and also to entertain new with the States of Afa. Hereat Hegesanax inserred and said, "That this was an indignity intolerable, and which "he could not abide to hear, namely that Antiochus should be distaized of those Cities of Thrace "and Cherfonefus, which Selencus his great grand-father had conquered with fingular honor from King Lysmachus, whom he vanquished in war and slew in field, and setled the same in him as his rightful inheritance. As for the same cities possessed by the Thracians, Amiochus himself with as great praise and glory hath partly by force of arms regained out of their hands, and partly rea special praint and giory natur partity by roccoor arms regained out of the standard and defolat, the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat, the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat, the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat, the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat, the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat, the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat, the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat, the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat has been accounted to the peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and defolat has been accounted to the people of the p and namely, Lysimachia it self, as all the world feeth: and more than that, hath re-edified to his exceeding charge and expense, those that lay along in their ruins, and were consumed with fire. What likenes then is there between these two demands: namely, that Antiochus should quit the polletion of that which either he acquired or recovered in that fort: and that the Romans "hould abstain and forbear Afia, which never appearained unto them? To conclude, Amiochus "faith he) is destrous of the Roman friendship, but in such terms as may stand with his honor, & and near generous of the Roman Hendring, but in inch terms as many manners for mot purchase himself shame and reproach. Then Quinim rejoyned again in this manner: "For "afmuch as, qd, he, we balance and weigh things according to honefty (as in truth it is befitting the

"chief and principal state of theworld, and so great and mighty a King to prize that only or at Ppp 2 Geaftwise principally above all other regards) I would gladly know of you. Whether ye think it H " more honest of the Iwain, either to will and wish that all the Cities of Greece whatloever and " wherefoever should enjoy liberty: or to make them homagers and tributary? If Antiochus "thinketh it be an honorable thing for him to reduce into fervitude and bondage as his own, those Cities which his great grand-father held by right of arms, and whereof neither his father onor grand-father afore him were in possession: the people of Rome likewise esteemeth it a mate-" rial point that toucheth their faithfulness and constancy, not to sorsake the Greeks, whose pro-"tection and defence they have enterprifed and taken in hand. And like as they have freed Greece out of the hands of Philip fo they intend to deliver those Cities of Asia which are of Greekish " race and descent from the subjection of Antiochus. For the Greek Colonies were not sent into " Rolls and Ionia, to live in servitude under the King, but to increase and multiply, that a most I " ancient nation might spread over the face of the whole earth, Now when as Hegefianax knew not how to thit and turn himself, and could not deny but that the cause of liberty which the Romans pretended in the title of their quarrel, was of more honefly and credit, than that other of flavery: Let's lay away all these circumstances of words (quoth P. Sulpitius, the ancientest person of all the ten Delegats) and choose ye one of the two conditions which even now were expresly offered unto you by Quintins, or else make no more talk about amity with the Romans. Then quoth Menippus, As for us, we may in no case, neither will we capitulate and covenant any thing prejudicial to the Kingdom and royal flate of King Antiochus. The morrow after Quintius when he had brought all the Embaffies of Greece and Afra into the Senat, that they might know what affection the people of Rome carried, and what mind Antiochus bare to the Cities of Greece, he K declared before them all as well his own demands, as those of the Kings part: willing them to make report unto their own Cities, and affure them, that the people of Rome would maintain themagainst Antiochus (un'ess he departed out of Europe) with the same vertue, valour, and fidelity wherewith he had defended their liberty against Philip, Then Menippus was earnest with Quintius and the LL, of the Senat, befeeching them instantly not to proceed in hast to a decree whereby they should set all the world introuble and uprore; but both take leisure themselves and give respite unto the King to deliberat farther of the matter: for no doubt upon the relating of the conditions, he would confider upon them, and either obtain somewhat at their hands, or for peace fake yeeld his confent to all. Thus was the matter wholly and entirely deferred; and agreed it was, that the same Embassadors should be addressed unto the King, who had been with him at L Lylimachia, to wit, P. Sulpitius, P. Villius, and P. Elius,

Scarcely were they gone from the City and entred upon their journey, but Embaffadors arrived from Carthage, who reported, that without all doubt Antiochus made preparation for war, and therein wed the hand and ministery of Annibal: in so much, as it was seared also that a third Punick war would break out withal. Annibal, as we faid before, having fled his native countrey, repaired unto Antiochus, and was in great account and estimation with the King, for no other cause and policy in the world, but that the King who projected and plotted long time in his spirit to levy war upon the Romans, could find no man more fit than Annibal to break his mind unto, and with whom to discourse upon a matter of such consequence. Annibal his song and refolution was ever one and the same still, namely, To make war within Italy: and that Italy was M able to furnish a forrain enemy, with men munition, and victuals. For this he cast with himself and confidered, that if all were quiet there and no troubles fet a foot, but that the people of Rome might with the forces and riches of Italy, furnish themselves to make war without Italy, there was no Monarch nor nation under the fun able to make head against the Romans. He demanded therefore to have the command of 100 close thips with hatch and deck, 16000 foot, and 1000 horse: and with the said fleet he would first sail into Affrick, where he affured himself that he should be able to sollicit and induce the Carthaginians to rebellion: but if they held off and made it goodly and strange, yet would he settle in some part of Italy and levy war against the Romans. His advice and counsel furthermore was, that the King should with all his other forces pass into Europe, and in some one part of Greece keep his power together, and not to take the Sea, but to be, N ready ever to cross over; which would be sufficient to make a shew and raise a bruit all abroad of war. When he had perswaded the King to this designment and resolution, supposing that he was likewife to found and prepare the hearts afore-hand of his own countrymen to this purpofe: he durst not dispatch any letters unto them, for fear they might chance to be intercepted by the way, and so discover the whole plot. He hapned at Ephesus upon a Tyriau one Ariston, a man whole industry and dexterity he had tried in some small services wherein he had imployed him. Him he plyed with gifts in hand, but fed him more with large promifes of great rewards, which King Antiochus also himself seemed to make good and give his word for; and so sent him to Carthage with credence and inftructions. He acquainted him with the names of all those persons with whom he was to talk and confer: he furnisheth him with fecret tokens, whereby they might o affuredly know, that he was no counterfeit, but came with a meffage from him. Now whiles this Ariston conversed in Carthage, the friends of Annibal knew no sooner about what errand he came, than his very enemies. At the first, much talk and discourse there was in every corner of the City where they met, and at their feasts and merriments, of this matter. Afterwards at their councel table some stuck not to say, that the exile of Annibal was to little or no purpose, if whiles he was ablent he could contrive and compais new plots, and by folliciting and tempering mens minds,

A disquiet and trouble the state of the City. There is a stranger, say they, one Ariston a Tyrian, hither come with instructions from Annibal and King Antiochus: certain men there are, that daily have privy conference with him, and devise in secret of that, which anon will break out to the utter ruin and overthrow of all, "Whereupon they all cried with one voyce to convent Arifton pe-" remptorily before them, and to examine him about what business he was thither arrived; and un-" less he would bewray & declare the matter, to send him with Embassadors of purpose, to Rome: "For why? we have (fay they) felt the smart enough, and paid sufficiently for the folly and rash " head of one harebrained man already. Let privat persons bear their own load hereaster, and at "their own peril commit a trespals : provided alwayes, that the Common-weal be preserved clear "not only from all fault, but also from all apparance and bruit of any such intent. Ariston being R called before them, flood fliffy upon his integrity and excuted himfelf, and evermore used this for his best and surest desence, That he had brought no letters at all to any person: howbeit he could not render a ready & found reason of his coming thither; but especially he was shrewdly troubled and put to his trumps when they charged him, That he had talk and communication with those only of the Barchine faction. Hereupon arose some debate and altercation in the house; whiles fome were of opinion that he should be apprehended for a spie, and clapt up fast in ward : others again were of mind that there was no cause to make such a stir and tumuit; for it was an evil prefident to be given, that strangers coming to their City, should be troubled and hardly intreated: and the like measure no doubt would be offered to the Carthaginians in True & in other Towns of marchandife, whereum to they use to have refort for exchange and traffique. So for that day the C matter was put off. Ariston framing himself to play the crafty Carthaginian among these Carthaginians, wrote a certain bill, and in the shutting in of the evening, hung it up in the most conspicuous and publick place of all the City, even over the leat where the head Magistrate useth daily to fit; and himself about the third watch gat to shipboord and escaped. The morrow after, when the Sufferes were let on the bench to minister law, the bill aforelaid was seen, taken down, and read : whereinto this effect was written. That Ariston was not come with a message to any perfon in particular, but to all the Seniors or Elders in general (for fo they call the Senat.) After that the thing was by this means made a publick matter, and the whole state of the Senators reputed culpable they were not so earnest to search into privat persons. Howbeit thought good it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Rome to give information hereof to the Consuls and the Senat, and withal, to make complaint of certain wrongs done by Masanissa.

M. Janissa understanding that the Carthaginians were suspected and in some ill name among the Romans, and also at jar and variance within themselves; and namely, that the great and principalmen were had in jeal-only by the Senit for their conferences with Ariston; and their Senate likewise suspected by the people, by reason of that writing above-named of the said Ariston; and their senate this for a good advantage and opportunity to do them some injury, not only invaded their martitine parts and made spoil-but also torced certain tributary Cities to the Carthaginians for to pay himself tribute. That quarter of the countrey they call Emperia, It is the Sea coast of the less syris, and the country is exceeding sertile: there is in it one only City named Leptin, which paid to the Carthaginians for tribute-a talent every day. All this region Massaifs then had plagued fore, Eyea, and for one part thereof he made some claim, as being litigious whether it pertained to his Kingdom, or the Seignory of the Carthaginians: and because he knew for truth; that the Carthaginians and because he knew for truth; that the Carthaginians in and because he knew for truth; that the Carthaginian Embassadors were about to go to Rome, as well to purge themselves of some crimes wherewith they were charged, as to complain of him; therefore himself also addressed his Embassadors to Rome, who should also yone more matter against them of deeper suspition, and debate with also touching the right of those tributes. The Carthaginians were no sooner heard speak concerning that Tyrian stranger, but the LL, of the Senat grew into some doubt lest they should wage war with Anticolous and the Carthaginians both together. And this presumption of all the rest made the suspicion most pregnant, because when they had the party among them and were purposed to send him to Rome, they neither made the man himself sure, nor the bark wherein he arrived, After this, in to Komsthey neither made the man himself fure, nor the bark wherein he arrived. After this, if they fell to debate and argue with the Kings Embassadors, about the territory and land in controverly. "The Carthaginians pleaded for themselves, and stood much upon their bounds and listing that the land in fuit lay within that precinel by which P. Seipio the Conqueror limited out that territory which pertained to the leignory of the Carthaginians. Also they alledged the confession of the King himself, who at what sime as he pursued Aphere, that sled out of his own tealm and with a company of Numidians ranged abroad about Cyrene, made request unto them to give him leave to pais through this very ground, as if (without all question) it belonged to the Carthaginians. The Numidians answered again to these points & Gaid plainly to their faces, that they lied in their throats, as touching that supposed limitation and bounding by Seipio: and moreover, if we would go ((ay they) and search the very original indeed of the law, what sland all ought the Carthaginians have of their own proper inheritance? For being but meer to build them a City in, as they could compass with thongs cur our of one bull hide: And look whatsever how he are the control of the carthaginians that they described the area to more, whatsever how he area to more to the build them and no more,

"what over they had encroached upon without that nelt and feat of theirs in Byrfa, they gat and held it by force and violence. And as for the land now in first, they are not able to prove, that they alwains held the same in possession, no retart they kept it any long time together. But as consider and opportunies served of advantage, one while they, and another while the Numidian

"Kings made reentry and enjoied it, and evermore he went away with the possession thereof H "that was the ftronger and had the keener fword. In these confiderations they requested the Ro-"mans to leave the thing in that flate and condition, wherein it flood before that the Carthagi-" nians were enemies, or King Masanifa friend and allie to the Romans, and not to intermedie " between, nor take a part, but let the winner wear it, and him have it that can hold it. In conclufion it was thought good, that to the Embassadors of both parties this answer should be returned namely; That they would fend certain Commissioners into Affrick, to decide this controversy about the land in question, between the people of Carthage and the King. So there were sent of purpose, P. Soipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Minutius Rufus. Who having heard what could be faid, and feen the thing, left all hanging fill in fulpence and undecided, without adjudging it by their definitive lentence to the one or the other. But whether they fo did, on their I own head and felf-accord, or by direction from the Senat, is not so certain as it seemeth agreeable unto that present time in policy, to leave them as they found them, and the controversie still depending. For unless it were so, Scipio himself alone, in regard of the knowledge that he had of the thing, and of his authority with the persons (so much bound they were unto him on both sides) might with a word of his mouth, or a nod of his head, have ended all this matter.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and thirtieth Book.

Publius Scipio Africanus being fent Embaffador uno Antiochus,talked at Ephelus with Annibal (who had fided with Antiochus) to this end, that he might rid him of that fear which he had cor ceived of the people of Rome, as touching the taking away of his life. Among other matters paffed between them, when he demanded of Annibal, whom he judged to have been the noblest and greatest warrior that ever was he answered, that it was Alexander King of the Macedonians: for that he with a small s power had discomficed and defeated an infinite number of armies, and withal, passed throughthose far diffite and remote parts of the world unto which a man would not believe that it were possible for any perfon to go and fee them, When he asked again of him whom he deemed for the fecond: Who but Porchus. (ad he) because he taught the manner how to pitch a camp, & besides, no man had the cast to gain places and holds for advantage nor could fet his corps de guard or plant garrisons better than he. And when he proceeded still to know whom he took to be the third, Annibal named his own good felf. At which answer Scipio fella laughing: And what would you kave faid then (ad. he) if your hap had been to have vas-quished me? Marry then (Siith he) I would have set my self before Alexander, before Pytthus, and before all other. Among other prodigious fights, whereof there were reported very many, it is faid, that in The Romans prepare to war with Antiochus. Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, provoked by the Atolians, who follicited both Philip and also Antiochus to mage war against the people of Rome, revolted from the Romans and after he had levied war against Philopamen, Pretor of the Acheans, was by the Etolians flatn. The Etolians likewife abandoned the friendship of the people of Rome, with whom Antiochus King of Syria banded: who warred upon Greece, and surprised many Cities, and navely, Chalcis and Euboxa among the rest. Resident, this book contained the martial affairs in Liguita, and the preparation of Antiochus for the wae:

The five and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

PN the beginning of that year wherein thefe affairs thus passed, Sext. Digitius Pretor in high Spain, fought battels (rather ordinary, and for number many, than otherwise memorable and worth the ipeaking) against those States, whereof after the departure of Cato a great forthad rebelled. And those battels for the most part were so unfortunar, that hardly he could deliver up to his successor the one half of those souldiers which he had received. And doubtless all Spain would have taken heart again, if the other Pretor P. Cornelius Scipio, the fon of Chema had not fped better in many of his conflicts beyond Iberm. Upon which terrour no fewer than fifty good Towns revolted unto him. And these exploits performed Scipio, as Pretor; Who also in quality of Propretor, encountred the Luftrans upon the way, as they returned homeward charged with a mighty great booty raised out of the base Spain, which they had unterly pilled and spoiled : where O' he fought from the third hour of the day unto the eight, with doubtful event. For number of fouldiers he was inferious to his enemies but for all things elfe he had the vantage, and went beyond them. For his baraillons were well appointed and close compacted of armed men, and so he charged upon the enemies marching in a long train, and the same encumbred with a deal of cartel: besides his souldiers were fresh and in heart, whereas the other were wearled with long tra-

wel. For the enemies fet forth at the third watch, and beinder their night journey, they had mar-thed three hours also of the day, and without any report of reft at all, they came to a conflict pre-fensly upon their travel on the way. And therefore at the beginning of the battel, so long as they were in any heart, and their fireign ferved, they troubled, and difordered the Romans with the were start to be equal in fight, In which hazard of ant tringe mey garner to the honour of Jupiters doubtful iffue the Propretor vowed to fet forth certain foleaning ames to the honour of Jupiters in case he might discomfit the enemies, and kill them in chase, At the length the Romans advanthe cate in light the control of the Luft and retreated, yea, and anon turned their backs quite. And when as in this train of victory the Romans purited them hard in the rout, there were of theenemies sainupon 12000, 500 and forty taken priloners, all in manner horsemen; and of military B enigns they carried away one hundred thirty and four. Of the Roman army leventy and three only were lost. This battel was fought not far from the City slips. And thither brought P. Cornehis his victorious army, enriched with prey and pillage. Which was laid all abroad before the Town, and every man had leavegiven to challenge and claim his own. All the reft was given to the Treasurer for to be fold, and the mony raised thereof, was parted among the fouldiers, Now had not C. Flamains the Pretor as yet taken his leave of Rome, when these things sell out in Spain, and therefore both he and his friends talked and discoursed much upon these occurrents both good and bad; and for almuch as a great war in his Province was broken out to a light fire, and himself was to receive from Sext, Digitus but a small remnant of an army, and the same timorous fill and full of fright, as not well recovered of their former flight, he had affaied to bring C about that the Senat would affigu unto him one of the City-legions; to the end that when he had joined thereto those fouldiers which himself had enrolled according to an order set down by the Senat, he might out of all that number chuse forth fix thousand and five hundred footmen, and three hundred horiemen. With which legion (for in the army of Sext. Digitius he reposed small confidence) he minded to make war. The ancient Senators denied and faid, That acts of the Sens t. were not to be made upon every flying tale and report fet abroad and blazed by some particular persons in savor of Magistrats. Neither would they hold any thing for certain, but that which either the Pretors themselves wrote out of the Provinces, or Embassadors sent of purpose, related. And if there were any fuch commotion and trouble in Spain, they were of advice, that the Pretor thould levy in haff without Italy, such tumultuary fouldiers, as in that case were usually taken up. D The intent and mind of the Senat was, that fouldiers should in that fort be prest out in Spain, Valerius Antias writeth, that C. Flaminius both failed into Sicily to levy and muster men, and also ashe made fall from Sicily toward Spain, wasby wind and tempest put with the shore of Africk; where he found certain souldiers dispersed over the country, remaining of the army of P. Africanus: of whom he took a military oath to ferve him in his wars: and that to thefelevies raised in two Provinces, he joyned also a third in Spain. The war of the Ligurians likewife grew as fult : for they had already befieged and invefted Pifa with forty thouland men: and thither reforted and flocked dayly unto them great multitudes as well for hope of pillage, as upon the bruit and rumor that went of the war. Minutins the Conful. came at the day appointed to Arctium, which was the Rendezogus where he had commanded all E his fouldiers to meet him : from whence he marched with a fourfquare Batrailon toward Pife. And when the enemies had removed their camp a mile from the City on the other fide of the River, the Conful entred the Town, which no doubt by his coming he preserved. The next day himself also encamped on the other side of the River, almost half a mile from the enemies, from which place he made light skirmishes with them and saved the textitory of his allies from the excurrions and robberies of the enemies. He durit nor as yet try a barrail in pitched field, as having but taw and new fouldiers, and those gathered our of many kinds of men, and not so well known among the would easy and spot grace game of many arms of men, and not to wen another among members, not only came forth into the field ready to bid battail, and hazard all upon a throw. Big having multiple at commandment and to forte, lent out into all parts into the property of the pr fence ready at hand, well manned and guarded, by means whereof all was convoyed into their burroughs and Towns

* After Sun-

This was not so closely carried, but the Consul had an inkling thereof: and therefore where as H his manner was to fet out in his march early in the morning, long before day light, now for fear left the darkness of the night should increase the terror of a cumultuary skirmish, he waited for the day. And albeit the sun was up before he removed and set forward, yet he sent out a Troop of horiemen to four and discover the quarters. And after he was advertised by these enials what number there was of enemies, and in what place they were, he commanded that all the baggage and carriage of the whole army should be bestowed in the mids, and that the Triarii should stake and pale it all about, whiles he with the rest of his forces marched in order of battail, and approached the enemy. The like also did the French, after they once faw that their ambush and trains were detected, and that they must of necessity fight a fet pitched battail, where, down right blows, clean frength, and pure valour, was to carry away the victory. Thus about I the second hour of the day they affronted one another. The left wing of the horsemen of the allies and the extraordinaries fought in the vanguard, under the conduct of two Lieutenants than had been Consuls, to wit, M. Marcellus, and T. Sempronius, Consul the year before. The new Conful one while was in the front of the battail, another while at the tail to keep in the legions, left for eager defire of fight they should advance forward to the conflict before that the fignal was given. As for the men of arms belonging to the legions, he commanded Quintius and P. Minutius, Marshals or Colonels, to bring them forth, and conduct them without the battailinto a large plain, from whence out of the open ground they should on a suddain charge the enemies, when he gave them a fignal by found of Trumpet. Thus as he was marshalling and directing his men. there came a messenger from T. Sempronius Longus with a report, that the loose Extraordinary K fouldiers aforesaid were not able to abide the violence of the Gauls: that very many of them were flain, and those that remained, partly for weariness of travail, and partly for featful cowardice began to quail their heat of fight : and therefore if he thought fo good, he should fend one of the two legions to fuccour, before they had received farther dishonor. Whereupon the second legion was fent, and the Extraordinaries retired themselves out of the battail. Then began the conflict anew, by reason that the souldiers came in fresh and in heart, and the legion besides was compleat and fully furnished with all her companies: the left wing of horsemen aforesaid was retired our of the battail, and in lieu thereot, the right wing advanced into the fore-front. By this time the fun with extreme (corching heat, tofted and fried the bodies of the Frenchmen, which of all things can least abide heat: howbeit, standing with their ranks thick and close together, one while they L leaned one upon another: other whiles they refled and bare themselves upon their targets, and instained the violence of the Romans, Which when the Conful perceived, he commanded C. Livius Salinator who had the conduct of the light horse in the wings, to fend in the quickest horse in all his company, with ful carrier to break their ranks; and gave charge that the legionary horsemen should abide behind in the reregard. This tempest and storm of Cavalry first shuffled and put in dilaray the battail of the Gauls, and afterwards brake their ranks and files clean yet not fo, that they turned their backs : for why, their Captains and Leaders would not fuffer them, laying about with their truncheons upon the backs of them that so trembled for fear, and forced them again into their ranks: but the light horsemen aforesaid riding among them would not permit them to stand to it, and keep their place. The Consul for his part encouraged and exhorted his M fouldiers to flick to it awhile, for the victory was in their hands; and to charge fill upon them, lo long as they faw them difordred and affrighted : for if they suffered their ranks to close again they should abide another conflict, and the same perhaps doubtful and dangerous. The Enfign-bearers he commanded to advance their banners: and thus at length with putting all their power and good will together, they discomfited the enemy, and put him to flight. After they shewed their backs once and took them to their heels, running away on all fides, then the legionary horsemen were fent out after to follow the chase: fourteen thousand Boians that day were flain, a thousand and nine hundred taken prisoners alive: 221 horsemen, three of their Leaders, and of Ensigns were won 212, and chariots 63. The Romans likewisewon not this victory so cleer, but it cost them some bloud. For of their own souldiers and allies together, there died above sive thousand, N 23 Centurions, besides sour Colonels of Allies, and two Marshals of the second legion, to wit, M. Genutius, and M. Martius,

At one and the felf fame time in manner, both the Confuls letters were brought to Rome, Cornelius his letters, touching the battail fought at Musica, with the Boians; but the other of Q.Mination 19 fe, were written to this effect, That whereas by lot it belonged to him to hold the affembly for the election of new Magistrats, yet confidering in how doubtful terms of hazard his affairs stood in Ligaria, that he might not possibly depart from theirse without the inter ruin of the allies, and hinderance of the weal publick; therefore if it might feem fo good untain LL of the Senat, he would advise them to fend unto his brother Consul, That his, who had fainlifted his was, might return to Rome for to hold the forefaid general assembly for the election; but in case one should think much thereof, because this charge properly appertained not to him; be promised them, that himself would do whatsoever the Senate should think good. But he requested them to consider and be well advised, Whether it were not more expedient for the commonweal to proceed rather to an interregin, than that he should leave the Province in shat state of jeopardy. The Senat hereupon gave in charge to C. Serihomise forto send two Embassabs both of Senators calling, unto L. Cornelius the Consul, who should carry also with them unto him

A the letters of his colleague written and fent unto the Senat: and withal, to let him understand that unless he would come himself to Rome for the election of new Magistrats to succeed the Senat would suffer an interreign rather than call away Q. Minutins from the war unfinished, and wherein he was wholly employed. The Embaffadors that were fent, brought word back, That I Cornelius would repair to Rome himself for the chusing of new Magistrats, As touching the letters of L. Cornelius, wherein he gave them to understand, what happy iffue & success he had in the battail with the Boians; there was some reasoning and debate in the Senat-house: for M. Claudius his Lieutenant had written other letters privately to most of the Senators, to this effect; That they were much beholden and bound to give thanks unto the good fortune of the people of Rome. and the valour of the fouldiers, in that they sped so well as they did: for by means of the Con-B ful, not only there were a good number of men loft, but also the army of the enemies was escaped out of their hands, when they had fit opportunity prefented unto them, of a final defeat and overthrow thereof: and that by this occasion there was a greater number of the fouldiers miscarried; for that they who should have rescued and succoured those that were distressed, came too late out of the reregard: and the reason why the enemies got away and escaped was this, because the legionary horsemen had not the signal soon enough sounded unto them, and could not possibly pursue them in the chale. Therefore as concerning that points they would not determine any thing rashly and hand over head, but the matter was referred and put over to a more frequent assembly of Senators.

A greater object there was to trouble their heads; for the City was much oppressed with usu-C ry: and albeit the avarice and covetouinels of men had been well gaged and bridled by many laws concerning usury, yet there was a cautelous device and shift found out, to avoid all statutes in that behalf: to wit, that all obligations should pass in the names of allies, and be sealed unto them, who were not tied and bound to observe the laws aforesaid. By which means the creditors enwrapped their debtors in what bonds they lift, and forced them to pay extream interest as they would themselves, without flint. For to see into this disorder and enormity, and to redress the same, it was thought good and order taken, to set down and limit a certain day, namely, upon which the usurers were last restrained. From which day all those allies should come in and declare and profess, what mony they had put forth upon usury to any citizens of Rome; and that the creditour should have right to recover those monies put forth from that time; according to such n conditions as the debtor would himself. Hereupon, after there were discovered great sums of money and debts contracted by this fraudulent practile, M. Sempronius a Tribun of the Commons, by advice of the Senat propounded a law, and the Commons allowed it, That the same course of putting out money practifed between citizen and citizen of Rome, should likewise be in force among the allies of the Latin Nation. In this fort went matters in Italy, both within the City of Rome, and also in the wars abroad.

In Spain the war was nothing fo much as the bruit that ran thereof. C: Fluminius in high Spains, wan Ilucis, a Town in the Oretans countrey: after which exploit, he laid up his fouldiers in their winter harbour. And in winter time there passed certain light skirmithes snot worth the naming) against the excursions of brigands and theeves, I may rather any, than enemies: and yet the fortune was variable, and not without some loss of men. As for M, Fulvius he atchieved great matters: for he sought in a ranged battail with banner displaied against the Vacceans, the Vectones, and the Celtiberians, before the Town Toletum; where he discomfitted and put to slight the army of those nations, and took prisoner alive, their King Hilermas.

Whiles these things thus passed in Spain, the day drew neer, of the solemn election of Magistras ar Rome: and therefore L. Cornelius the Consul having left M. Claudius Lieutenant in the army, came to Rome: who, after he had discoursed in the Senat-thouse of his own exploits; and in whatestate the province stood, he complained to the LL, of the Senat, that considering so great a war was brought to an end, by one battail so fortunatly and happily tought, there was no solemnity to the honour of the Gods, performed in that behalf. Over and bet des, he demanded. That I have been the Senators were to deliver their opinions to this demand, Q. Metellus, who had been Consul and Dictator, rose up and said,

That there had been letters brought at one and the same time is both from the Conful Cornelius to the Senar, and also from M. Marcellus to a great many of the Senators, and those letters importing constrainties: whereupon the conful tation of that matter had been deferred and put off to the them that it might be argued and debated in the presence of them both, who wrote the letters and therefore I ever looked (quoth he) that the Conful (knowing specially that his Lieuteman had written and informed somewhat against him, and considering that himself was to rewait to Rôme) would have brought him also with him: seeing that it had been more meet and befixing him to have delivered the army to T. Sempronius, one that was in the commission and had a command than to a Lieutenan Ruit if sould seem now that have a lie behind so execution.

G had a command, than to a Lieutenan, But it fhould feem now, that he was left behind are enough off ofvery purpole; for fear he would avow and juffife perfonally his hand-writing, and charge him face to Jace. And that if the Conful should make report of any untruth, he might be challengedifferefore; and the thing sifted and carvased; until the truth appeared clearly and came to light: and theteforemy opinion is (quoth he) that nothing be determined at this present, as touching the demands of the Consul. But when as he perfished notwithstanding; and followed the suit still, namely, that they would ordain a solemn procession, and that himself might enter the City, tiding in triumph: then Marcin and C. Titinin, both Tribuns of the Commons, protefted, H that they would interpose their negative, and cancel the order of the Senat in that behalf.

he

The Cenfors for that time, were Sex. Elius Patus and C. Cornelius Cathegus, created the year before. Cornelius took a review of the City and numbred the people; and there were accounted by his survey 143704 polls of Citizens. Great flouds arole that year, and Tiber overflowed all the flats and plain places of the City: and about the gate Flumentana certain houses and buildings were overthrown withal, and laid along. The gate Calimontana besides, was firicken with lightning, and the wall about it was likewise blasted from heaven. At Aricia, Lannvium, and in mount Aventin, it rained flores. And reported it was from Capua, that a great fwarm of Walps came flying into the market place, and lettled upon the Temple of Mars; which being with great care taken up and gathered together, were afterward confumed with fire. In regard of these pro- I digious tokens, order was given, that the Decemvirs should search and peruse the books of sin bylla; whereupon a novendial facrifice (to continue nine dayes) was appointed, a publick procession folemnized, and the City was cleanled and hallowed. About the same time M. Porcius Cato, dedicated the Chappel of Virgin Victory, neer to the Temple of the Goddels Victory, two vears after that he had vowed it. In that year also the Triumvirs, C. Manlius Volfo, L. Apullius Fullo, and P. Elius Tubero, (who had preferred a bill of request about the planting of a Colony I had commission granted, to conduct a Colony of Latins into the countrey of Thurium and this ther went three thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen; a small number in comparison of the largeness and quantity of the territory. There might well have been fer out thirty acres for every footman, and threescore for an horseman: but by the motion and advice of Apullius, one K third part of the Lands was excepted and referved to the end, that afterwards in time, they might enrol new Coloners if it pleased them. And therefore the footmen had twenty acres, and the horsemen forty apeece.

Now approached the end of the year, and more ambition there was, and hotter fuit for place of dignity in the election of Confuls, than ever had been known any time before. Many mighty men, as well of the Paritii and nobles, as the Commoners, flood and laboured hard for the Confulfhip, to wit, P. Cornelius Scipio, the fon of Cneus, who lately was departed out of Spain after he had atchieved many worthy deeds. L. Quintius Flaminius who had been Admiral of the navy in Grecce, and Cn. Manlius Volfo, all of the Nobility. But of the Commons were C. Lelius, Cn. Domitius, C. Livius Salinator, and M. Acilius, But all mens eyes were fixed upon Quintius and Corneli-L us: For they defired one place, being both of them nobly descended, and their fresh glory for feats of war, recommended both the one and the other. But above all other things, the brethren of these competitors, two most renowned warriors of their time, set the debate on a light fire. The glory of Scipio, as it was the greater of the twain, so it was more subject to envy. The honour of Quintius was more fresh, as who that yeer had newly triumphed. Over and besides, the one of them had been now almost ten years continually conversant in the eyes of men (a thing that maketh great men not so highly regarded, by reason that they are grown stale, and the world is full already of them) also he had been twice Conful, and Cenfor fince he vanquished Annibal. But in Quimius all was fresh and new, to win the good grace and favor of men. And more than that, he neither after his triumph had obtained ought of the people, nor, to fay a truth, requested any M thing. He alledged, that he made fuit for his own natural and whole brother by both fides, and not for a Coulin German; in the behalf of a very companion and partaker with him in the managing of the war (for as himfelf ferved by Land, fo his brother performed many exploits by fea.) So he obtained, that Quintius should be preferred before his competitor, whom Africanus and his brother [Afiatious] brought in and graced, whom the whole race of Cornelii feemed to countenance even then when a Cornelius, Conful, was prefident of the election, and held the affembly whom the Senat had given so grave a testimony of, in adjudging him to be the best man simply in all the City, and thought most worthy to receive the goddels, dame Idea, coming from Pellinusto the City of Rome. Thus were L. Quintins, and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus created Confuls, in such fort, that Africanus was of no credit, and bare no stroke at all (ye may be fure) in the election of N a Conful out of the third estate of Commons, albeit he emploied himself, and did his best for C. Lalius. The next day after were the Pretors elected namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Fulvius Centimalus, A. Attilius Serranus, M. Pabius Tamphilus, L. Valerius Tappus, and Q. Salonius Sarra Inthis vear M. Emplius Lapidus and L. Emplius Paulus, the Cenfors, bare themselves so in their office, 18 they made their year to be notable and much spoken of. They condemned and fined many of the City grafiers or farmers of the common pastures : and of that money which arose of their amercements, were certain gilded shields made, which were set up on the finial or lantern of Jupiters Temple. They made one terrace or gallery without the gate Trigemina, with a marchants Hall or Burse adjoined thereto, neer Tyber: and another from the gate Fontinalis they built in length as far as to the Altar of Mars, leading to Mars field.

For a long time nothing was done in Ligaria worth the remembrance. But about the end of the year twice were the Romans in great jeopardy: for both the camp of the Conful was affailed and hardly defended, and also not long after, as the Roman host marched through a streight pass, the army of the Ligarians kept the very gullet of the passage, and the Conful seeing he could not make way through, turned his ensigns, and began to retire the same way he came: but by that time, some of the enemies had gained also the back part of the pass, insome as the lamentable remembrance of the Caudine overthrow, not only presented it self to their spirit and mind, but also was in manner an object to their eye. Now had he amongst his auxiliary or aidforces, to the number almost of eight hundred horse. Whose Captain promised the Consul, that he and his would breakthrough whither way he would, let him only buttell him which of the two quarters were better peopled and inhabited: for the first thing that he did, he would fire their Willages and houses; to the end, that the sear and tright thereof might force the Ligurians to depart out of the chase which they held and beset, and run to succour their own neighbours. The Conful commended him highly, and fed him with hope of large rewards. Whereupon the Numidians mounted on horseback, and began to ride about the corps de guard of the enemies, without offering to charge upon any man. At the first, a man that had seen them, would have R thought nothing more contemptible, being both men and horse, little, spare and gaunt. The horseman unarmed and without weapon, save that he carrieth about him some light darts: the horses without bridles; and as they ran shutting out their siff necks, and bearing their heads forward without any reining at all, they made a very ill favoured fight. And the riders, for to make themselves more despised, would on purpose seem to take fals from their horses, and made their enemies good sport. Whereupon they (who if at first they had been affailed, would have been heedful & ready to have received the charge) now fat flill (many of them unarmed) to behold this plealant passime. The Numidians would gallop toward them and presently ride back again, but so as by little and little they gained ground, and advanced neerer to the pais, yet making femblance, as if they had had no rule of their hories, but were carried thither against their wils, At the last, they C fer spurs to their horses indeed, and brake through the mids of the enemies guards and so soon as they had recovered the open ground, they fet on fire all the houses neer the high way fide, and so forward they burnt the next village they came unto, and destroied all afore them with fire and fword, First, the smoak that was descried, afterwards, the outcry heard of them that were affrighted in the villages, and last of all, the children and old folk that fled to fave themselves, made a trouble and hurlyburly in the camp: infomuch, as every man of himfelf without advice, without warrant or direction, made what half he could to run and tave his own. Thus in the turning of an hand, the camp was abandoned, and the Conful delivered from fiege, arrived thisher where he intended. But neither Boians nor Spaniards (with whom that year the Romans made war) were fo foitefully and maliciously bent against them, as the whole nation of the Ætolians. They at the D very first were in very good hope, that presently upon the remove of the forces out of Greece, Antiochus would have entred Europe, and seized upon the vacant possession thereof: and that neither Philip nor Nabis would be in rest and do nothing. But seeing them not to stir in any place they thought it high time tomake some trouble and confusion themselves, for sear left by delayes and lingring, all their designments would turn to nothing: and therefore they published a Diet or Councel to be holden at Naupathum. In which affembly Thous their Pretor, after he had made grievous complaint of the wrongs received by the Romans, moving and folliciting the flate of Esolia for that they of all other nations and Cities of Greece, were least honoured and lee by after that victory, whereof they had been the cause) gave his advice, That there should be Embassadors fentro all the neighbour Kings, not only to found their minds and affections, but also to incite E and prick them every one forward to enter into arms against the Romans. So Damocritus was addressed to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicaarchus the brother of the Pretor unto Antiochus, Damocritus had in commission to fignify unto the tyrant of Lacedamon, " That by the loss of his "maritime Cities, the very strings and snews of his tyranny and Kingdom were cut in sunder; "For from thence was he furnished with fouldiers, from thence had he his ships and servitors at "Sea: whereas now, he might see the Achaans LL, and rulers of Peloponnesus, whiles himself was "pinned up and enclosed within his wals, and never should he have opportunity to recover him-" felt, if he let pals this that presently was offered unto him. No Roman army was now in Greece: "and never would the Romans think it sufficient cause, to pass over the Seas with their legions "into Greece, for any occasion of Gyttheum or other Laconians inhabiting the Sea-coasts, These F reasons were laid forth to incense the conrage of the tyrant, to the end, that when Ansochus was once passed over into Greece, he being touched in conscience, that he had broken the Roman league by committing outrage upon their allies, might of necessity join and band with Antochus:

"Semblable remonificances and reasons when Nieander for to provoke and periwade Philip: and a much more matter he had to enforce that point, as the King was depoted from much higher defigere of effect than the tyrant had been, and allo had fulfained far greater loffes. To this, he alledged the ancient name and renown of the KK, of Nacodon; and how that nation had overunthe whole world and filled all places with their noble conquelts & victories. Moreover he fidid-That he advised him to take a course, which was last both to be enterprised, and also easy to see executed. For he gave not Philip counsel to fit is, before that Anticohns were passed over with a samily into Greece and considering that he without the aid of Anticohns had maintained war is long against the Romans and Etolians, what possible means had the Romans to withstand the Romans of National Ret he Actional with the Romans and Etolians is allies, who even then were fercere pensies than the Romans of Over and besides, he interred this reason also, what a brave and doughty Captain Annibalwas, aman eyen born to be an enemy to the Romans, and who had slain already more leaders and southern than the had other motives to perswade with Antiochus. First, and principally in this passed with Antiochus, First, and principally in the properties of theirs, than were less behind. These were the allegations of Niconder to itself.

pally above all others, he affirmed, "That how loever the prize and booty of Philip fell to the H a Romans, the victory was gained and atchieved by the Atohans, and none but they either e gave the Romans entrance and pallage into Greece, or furnished them with forces for the per-"formance and accomplishment of the victory. Then he shewed and made promise what nower it as well of foor as horie they would prefent anto Amiathin toward his wars, what places they " Would give him for his land-forces, and what havens and harbours for his Riength and army at "Sea. After all this he fluck not (co ferve his own turt) for to over-reach and tell a lond lie as conting Philip and Nabis, in giving out confidently that they were both of them ready and at "the point to renuewar: and would take the vantage of the very first opportunity and occasion that could be prefented; to recover those things which by war they had loft. Thus the Exclises laboured to let all the world at once up on the top of the Romans. Howbeit, the KK, were either I not moved at all with their folliciting, or bestirred them more flowly than they looked for. But as for Nabio, he fent immediatly about all the Towns by the Sea fide, certain persons of purpose to fow discord and kindle seditions among them: and some of their principal citizens he won by gifts and prefents to his own putpole and delignments: but fuch as stiffy continued fast and firm in alliance and allegeance with the Romans, those he made away and murdred. Now had T. Onic tips given in charge and commission to the Acheans, forto guard all the Laconians that dwek upon the Sea-coasts : and therefore prefently they both dispatched their Embassadors unto the Tyrant, to put him in mind of the confederacy and affociation with the Romans, and to warn him and give him advertisement, that in no wife he would trouble that peace, which he had so earnestly craved and sought for : and also sent aid unto Gytthenin, which now the tyrant began to K affault; yea, and addressed other Embassadors also to Rome to give intelligence of these occur-

And from thence in the beginning of the Spring, after he had fent his son Antiochus into * Spria for to defend and keep in obedience the humoft frontiers of his Kingdom, left in his absence there might arise fome troubles behind his back, he marched with all his Land forces againfuthe Pindlans, who inhabit about * Selga. At the fame time the Romans Embaffadors P. Sulpitias and P. Villius; who as we faid before ! had been fent unto Antiochius with direction first to visit K. Emmenes arrived at * Elan, and from thence went up to " Pergamus, where Eumenes kept his royal court. Eumenes was defirous in his heart that Antiochus thould be warred upon: supposing verily, that if he were at peace, being a frince so much mightier than himself, he would be but an ill and dangerous neighbour so neer ninto him; but if war were once afoot that he would be no more able to beard and match the Ros mans than Philip had been : and that either he should wholly be overthrown and cometo uter ruin; or if, being vanquished he had peace given unto him by the Romans; then, as he loft muth thereby and would be weaker to himself should gain by the bargain, and grow mightier; that afterwards he might be able easily of himself to make his part good, and hold his own against him, without the help and aid of the Romans : or if any misfortune should happen unto him he were m better by far, to hazard any fortune what soever in the Roman society, than either alone to endute the Lordly dominion of Amischus and be subject or in resuling to obey, be compelled thereto by force and arms. For these causes he employed all the tredit and authority he had, yea, and addressed all counsel that he could devise for to prick on and see forward the Romans in this war. Sulpitiat remained behind fick at Pergamus, But Villius advertised that the King was occupied and busied in the Pissdian war, went to Ephelis: and whiles he abode there some few dayes, he endevoured and made means to have conference oftentimes with Annibal, who haply at that sime forourned there; both to found his mind if possibly he could, and also to secure him of all fear from the Remans. In these meetings and communications, no other thing passed nor was done betweenthen, But fee what enfued herenpon of it felf, as if it had been a thing wrought and compassed of meer N pollicy. Annibal by this means was less set by and in smaller credit with the King, yea, and in all matters began to be more and more fuspected and had in jelousie. Claudius (the Historian) who followeth the Greek books of Acilius, writeth that P. Africanus was joyned in that emballinge, and that he talked and deviled with Annibal at Ephefus: and namely, maketh report of oneconference and speech between them twain and that is this. Africanus demanded of Annibal, whom in his judgment, he took to have been the greatest commander for feats of arms, that ever was: to which he made answer, that he judged Alexander the King of the Macedonians was simply the most excellent warrior; in this regard, that he with a small power had deseated innumerable armies and befides had passed as far as to the utmost bounds of the whole earth, even to those lands, that a man would think incredible for any one to reach unto. And when he asked again whom o he deemed worthy to fland in the second place: He answered that Pyrrhus was the man ; for that he first caught how to pitch a camp and above all other points of military skill no man knew berter to choose our commodious ground and places of advantage, or more cunningly to plant and dispole garrifons: belides he had fich affeight and detterity to draw and win men unto him, that the Italian nations had rather have been lubject to him pforem Prince than to live under the peope of Rome, not withit and ing they had of long time the Selguory and rule of those parts, And

A when he proceeded fill to know whom he required for the third, he made no flicking at the materrhet named himself. Wherenpon Scipio 200k up a langiter and replied again. What would you lay then, if your hap had been to have inbuted me? Mary then, quoth hand would think is year worthy to the far before Alexander, before Byrthus, es and before all othermerial men and commanders in the whole world. At this answer, Service took delight and pleasure to see how subtilly and cauteloully he had like a cunning Carthaginian, couched his words an actertain kind, of flattery, as if he had sequestred him from out of the range and tack of all other Gaptains, as being by many degrees incomparable; and far above all others. Then Killins went forward from Ephelin to Apamen; and thither Amisachus also repaired for to meet him, hearing of the coming of Roman legats, in this communication and conference at Aparea, the matter was debated much after the B fame form, as it had been at Rome between Quintins and the Kings Embaffadors. But the news of Antischusthe Kings fon his death (whom I taid a little before to have been sent into Sprid) brake off the peace, Great mourning and forrows there was in the Kings Court, and much was that young Prince miffed and moaned, for, that good proof he had given of himfelf, that if he had lived any long time, he would have proved by all likelyhood of his towardness, a great, a mighty, and a righteous King. The deerer and better beloved he was of all men, the more suspicious was his death: and namely, that his father doubting that he would pressforward and he instant to succeed him in his old agestook order by the ministery of certain Bunuchs or guelded men (persons greatly accepted with Kings for such services to have him poisoned. And they say, that another cause allo fee himforward to commit this secret act, because having given the City Lysmachia to his C fon Selenenishe had no such place to bestow upon Antiechus his fon, for to keep his residence in, whereunto he might have removed him farther off from his own person, under solout of doing him hopor. How beit great femblance and shew there was of much mourning and lamentation all over the court for certain dayes: infomuch as the Roman Embassador retired himself to Rergamusbecause he was loth to converse there uncivilly, at so unleasonable a time. The King returned to Ephofar, and give over the war that he had enterprized. Whese, the court gives being faut by occasion of the mourning time, he devised and consulted in great secret with one Minie and market friend unso him, and whom of all other he loved belt, and truffed most. This Alignosa meet franger and alrogenher ignorant in forein affairs and forces, measuring and esteeming the power and greatnes of the King by his exploits done in Syria or in AGa, deemed verily, that Anticomy had n not only the bearer canfe, in that the Romans demanded unreasonable conditions; but also should have the apper hand in the tryal thereof by war. When as now the King refuled to have any conference and dispute with the Embassadors, either for that he knew by good experience that it would be booslefs for him to to do, or because he was troubled in spirit upon this late and fresh object of grief and forrow: Minio undertook the business, and professed that he would speak to the point of the matter and to good purpole: and lo perswaded the King to send for the Embassadors from Pergamus. By this time Sulpitsus was recovered of his ficknes, and therefore both of them repaired to Ephefus; where Mino excused the King, and in his absence they began to treat about their affairs, Then Minio with a premeditate oration began in this wife, "I fee well (qd, he) "that you Romans precend unto the world a goodly title of feeting free the Cities of Greece, but E your deeds are not answerable to your words: and ye have set down unto Antiochus one man-" ner of law to be tied unto and practife your felves another. But what mean I to maintain the cause of the Cities of Greece, whom it were more "meet and reasonable that both we and the King himself would give audience unto, and let them olead what they can for their own felves? With that he commanded the embaffages of the Cities to be called in, which were prepared and infirmcted aforehand by Eumenes, who made this reckoning, that whatfoever firength went from Antiochus, should accrue and come unto him and his Kinedom. Many were admitted to speak : and whiles every one set forward his own cause. I fome by way of complaint, others in manner of demand, each one putting in for himself without regard of right or wrong, to he ferved his own turn, they fell at length from reasoning to warbling and wrangling in to much, as the Embassadors returned to Rome as uncertain and doubtful in all matters as they were when they came, without releating or obtaining any onething at all When they were difmified and gone, the King held a Councel as touching the Roman war. In which affembly fome delivered their opinion more freely and frontly than others : but generally the more bitter speech that any one used against the Romans, the greater hope he had to enterin-

to especial grace and favour with the King. One above the rest, inveighed much and spake against those proud and insolent demands of the Romans, who imposed hard laws and conditions upon Antiochus, the mightiest King of all Afia as if he had been no better than Nabis, whom they had K conquered and lubdued. And yet (faith he) they left unto Nabis some seignory and dominion in his own countrey and City of Lacedamon: whereas if Lampfacum and Smrna should be at the command of Antiochus, they deemed that an unworthy thing and a very indignity. Others opined and faid, "that those two Cities were but small causes, and not worth the naming, for so pullfant a Prince to frand apon and to war for, But alwayes (fay they) men begin with just and reasona-66 ble demands to make an overture and way to compais and obtain that which is unjust. Unless " one would believe that when the Persians requested of the Lacedamonians, water and earth, wither flood in need of a clor & turt of ground, or a draught of water. In like fort for all the world "the Romans do but found and try the King in their demands tout hing thele two Chies. For other Ciries likewife, to foon as they shall perceive that those two have shaken off the voke of L "obtdience, will foon revolt and turn to that people which is their deliverer, and at whole hands they hope for liberty. And say; that freedom were not to them more dear and presions than bondage yet it is the nature of every man to feed and please himself with a bare hope of a change and new world much more than with the affured hold of any present state what soever. There was in place at this councel, Alexander of Acarnania, one who fomtime had friended Philip but of face dayes was fall from him and followed the court of Antiochus a more wealthy and magnificent Prince: and being taken for a politician who had a special insight into the state of Greece & was not ignorant of the affairs of Rome had wound himself into high favour and inward friendthip with the King, that he was taken in to be one of his privy councel, and acquainted with all his fecrets. This man, as if the question in hand had been, not, Whether war should be levied or M no but, Where, and by What means, and How it should be managed spake aloud & said, "That "he made full reckoning and account in his very spirit and heart of the victory, in case the King " would pass the Seas over into Europe, to plant & settle himself in some part of Greece; and there " wage war: for at his very first coming he should see in arms already the Etolians, that inhabit "the very heart and centre of Greece, who would be the only Captains and port-enfigns to march "before them, ready to venture and enter upon the most difficult and dangerous enterprises of "war. Again, in the two cantons and angles as it were thereof, he should find Nabis of the one "fide from Peloponne fin, at hand to rile and raise those quanters, with intent to regain the City of "the Argives to win again the maritime Cities, which the Romanshave differzed & dispossessed " him of, and have mued and thut him within the walls of Lacedamon, On the other fide from N Macedony Bhilip would no doubt take arms, to foon as he first hear the first alarm and found of strompet, Full well (qd.he) know I his courage, and of what spirit and stomack he is right well I wot that he hath follered in that breft of his for a long time, anger and despite; like to these wild and lavage bealts, which either are kept within iron gates or fast tyed and bound : and as well I remember, how many a time he was wont (during the wars) to pray heartily to all the Gods, " to vonchiale for to give him Antiochia for his helper and affiltant : and if now he might enjoy "his wish and have the thing so long defired and praied for he would without any delay, enter into arms and war incontinently, Only (qd. Alexander) we must not linger and they nor drive off, " for all uch as herein confileth the very point of victory, even betimes to feize upon commoof dions places of advantage, before the enemies be possessed of them, Also with all speed, Annital O "isto be sent into Affrick, whereby the Romans may be diffracted, and compelled to turn them-" felves fundry wayes. Annibat only was not called to this councel; for by reason of the forefaid conferences with Villia, the King had him in fome jealoufy, and therefore he was out of favour, and of no credit and account with him. At the first, he put up this disgrace and made no words, but afterwards he thought iva better courses both to demand the cause of so suddain frangeness and alienation of his, and also to rake some good time to excuse and purge himself. And therefore upon a day having simply asked of the King, and heard the cause of his larger toward him; " Mo " father Amilian (qd. be) O Antiochiu, when upon a time he factificed unto the Gods.canfed me " fa very lixtle one jto be brought and presented before the Altar, where he forced me to touch the " fame with my hand, and to take an oath, Never to be friend unto the people of Rome. To accom-"plish and fulfill this oath, I maintained the wars for the space of fix and thirty years; by vertue of " this oath, in time of peace I was driven out of my native country; and being fled from thence, "this oath brought me into your court: and by the guidance and direction of this oath, if you "should disappoint me of my hope, yet what soever I know there are forces, where soever I hear "there is any firring and ruftling of arms, I shall seek all the world over, unril I find some Roman enemies. And therefore, if there be any of your Courtiers that have a mind and defire to advance R "themselves in your good grace, and would grow by carrying tales and accusing me unto youler sehem find some other subject and matter to do this by me : for I hate the Romans, and am like-

" wise hated of them, That this is truth which I say, my father Amilear and the Gods in heaven, can tellify. Wherefore, when loever you shall think to make war with the Romans, see you enter-"tain Annibal for one of your greatest and most assured friends: but if any occurrent shall force "you to peace, feek some other councellor and not me, to consult with al about that point. This speech was so effectual, that not only it prevailed with the King, but also reconciled Annibal unto his grace, And so they departed out of the councel with a full resolution to make war, At Rome it was commonly talked and discoursed, that Antiochus was an enemy, but no provi-

fion and preparation there was for war, but only wheeting the edge of their flomacks. For both C Consuls had no other Province but Italy affigued unto them to govern. And they were either to agree between themielves, or elie to cast lots, whether of the twain should hold the general affembly, and be president of the election for that year. And he whose hap was not to be charged with that business, was to be in readiness to lead forth the legions into any place out of Italy, as need should require. And to this Consul it was permitted to enrol two new legions of Citizens, and besides of allies and Latins 20000 foot, and 800 horse. To the other Conful were appointed those two legions, which L. Cornelius the Confut of the former year had under his governance: also of allies and Latins 15000 sootmen out of the same army, and 500 horse. As for Q. Minutius, his commission was continued still for the conduct of that army which he had in Liguria, And for to supply and make up the broken companies, he was allowed to enrol 4000 Roman footmen. n and 150 horse, and likewise to levy of the alives 5000 foot, and 250 horse for that service. To

Cn. Domitturit fell by lot, that he should go with a power out of Italy, whither soever the Senate gave order; and unio Quintin to govern Ganl. Then the Pretors election followed, who like-wile call lors for then Provinces. M. Fulvins Centimalus had the civil jurisdiction, and L. Seribonius Libo the forrain, L. Valerius Tappus governed Sicily, Q. Salonius Sarra, Sardinia: M. Bahins Tamphilus high Spain, and A. Attilius Serranus the bale. But these two changed their Provinces, first by an order from the Senate, and afterwards by an act also of the Commons, For to Attilius Macedony was affigned and the navy, and to Babius the countrey of the Brutii, Flamipins and Fulvius continued in the government and command of Span, and to Babius Tamphilus for the rule of the Brutii, were those two legions appointed which the year before lay in the City, B with commission to take up and levy of allies sisteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse to go thither. Anlas Attilias had in charge to cause thirty galleaces to be made with five banks of oars on a fide; and to take out of the harbors and docks as many old veffels as were fit for fervice, and to enrol mariners and rowers. The Confuls also were enjoyeed to deliver unto him two thoufand allies of the Latin nation, and a thousand Roman sootmen. It was commonly voyced, that these two Pretors with two armies both by Land and at Sea, were prepared against Nabis, who openly now affailed the confederats of the people of Rome. But still the Embassadors were looked for, who had been fent unto King Antiochus, and the Senat communded the Conful Domitius not to depart from the City before their return. The Pretors, Fulvius and Scribonius, whose charge it was to minister law and execute justice in Rome, had commission to provide a hundred

Fgaleaces, besides that seet which Attilian was to command. But before that either Consuls or Pretors went forth into their Provinces, there was a procession holden, in regard of the prodigies and fearful fights that were reported. For word was brought out of Picenum, that a sheegoat had yeared fix kids at once, and that it rained earth at Amsternum; and at Formia, that a gate and wall of the City were smaten with lightning; and (that which most of all troubled and frighted the Comful Domitius) that an Ox spake these words, Rome, take heed to thy felf. In regard certhe other prodigious tokens, these was a hopplication holden; but as for the Ox, the Soothfavers and howel-priess gave commandment, that he should with great care be kept and nourishthe Typer alto with more violence overflowed into the City than in the former year, and overthere we bridges and many buildings, especially about the gate Flument and. Moreover, a mighty

G huge stone shaken out of the Capitol cliff, sell from thence into the street called Ingarium, either by the force and violence of rain, or fomeearthquake (which if there were any, was fo little, that it could notibe perceived and that from withed many a man. In the countrey also, by reason of this delinger, much cattel was carried away with the floud, and many farm houses and granges were bonn down and laid along.

Before then L. Quinding the Confet was surved into his Province, Q. Minutius fought a batand write the Eigenstand in the servicory of Pife, and flue nine thousand enemies; the reft he difcomfitted, put to flight and chafed into their camps which being affailed, was defended manful- H ly with much fighting until dark night: and then the Ligurians flipt away in the night feafon fecretly. And by the dawning of the next day the Romansentred and feifed thereof when it was empty of the enemies. Less pillage was there found, for that ever and anon what booties foever they gat in the countrey they fent home to their houses. Minutius not withstanding gave the enemies no repole from that time forward. For being departed out of the territory of Pife he came into Liguria, where he destroyed their borroughs and Castles, and put all to fire and sword. There the Roman fouldiers filled their hands with the Tuscan prizes, fent thither by the forragers and

Much about this time the Embassadors returned to Rame, from the KK. who brought word and made relation of nothing that was sufficient to enforce them to proceed in any hast to war. I but only against the Lacedamonian tyrant, by whom (as the Achaan Embassadors also gave intelligence) the Sea coalts of Laconia were wronged and affailed, against the covenants of the league. Whereupon Autling the Pretor was fent with a fleet to defend the affociats, And for afmuch as there was no imminent peril from Amiochus, it was thought good, that both the Confuls should go into their Provinces. Domitius took his journey, and went the neerest way by riminum, and Quintius came into the Boians countrey by the way of Liguria. And thele two Consuls armies indivers quarters, wasted all abroad the enemies countrey. At the first some few of their Gentlemen and Horsemen, together with their Captains; afterwards, all those of Senators calling; and last of all, as many as were of any repute, worth and worship, to the number of fifteen hundred fled to the Contul. Likewi e in both Spains that year the affairs went prosperously: for not only C. Flaminius won by force of mantelets and engins of battery the rich and strong Town Litabrum, and took prifoner alive their Lord Corribilo a noble Prince, bur, also M. Fulvius the Pro-conful fought with two armies of the enemies twice, and put them to the worfe; and won by affault two Towns of the Spaniards Vescelia and Holone, with many other fortresses: the rest of themselves revolted unto him, After this he made a journey into the Oretans countrey, & there having gotten two towns. * Nolita and Cufibi, he fet forward and marched to the river Tagus. In that quarter thereflood * Toletum-a small City but strongly seated: whiles he assaulted it, there came a mighty army of the Vectons to aid the Toletans, with whom he fought a fet field, and won the day; and having defeated the Vestons, he forced the Tolerans with engins of battery, and won the Town.

But all the wars which at that time were in hand, nothing troubled the LL, of the Senate so much as the expectation of the war, which Antiochuchad not yet begun and enterprised. For albeit they had ever and anon certain advertisements and intelligences of an things by their Embaffadors, yet many flying tales and headless bruits there went without any certain Authors, reporting l'es as well as truths. And among the rest there ran a rumor, that Antiochus, so soon as he was come into Atolia, would presently put over a fleet into Sicily. Whereupon the Senate, notwithftar ding they had fent Attilius the Pretor with a fleet into Greece yet for almuch as there was need not of forces only but also of authority to entertain the hearts and affections of their allies, they fent over T. Quintius, Cn. Od avius, Cn. Servilius, and P. Villius, as Embaffadors into Greece, and gave order that M. Pabius should advance his legions out of the countrey of the Brutians, toward M Tarentum and Brundusium, that from thence if need required he might fail over into Macedonia. Moreover, That M. Fulvius the Pretor should put out a fleet of thirty fail, for the defence of the coast of Sicily and that the Admiral thereof should have full commission there to command snow L.Oppius Sali iator, who the former year had been one of the Ædiles of the Commons, had the conduct of those ships.) Also that the same Pretor should address his letters unto L. Valerius his Colleague, and advertised him that it was to be leared, that the armado of King Antiochus would cross over out of Atol a into Sicily; and therefore it was the will and pleasure of the Senate, that he should take up and enrol into that army which he had already, of tumultuary souldiers 12000 footmen, and 400 horse, by whose means he might desend that coast of the Province which looketh toward (riese. For the levy of these forces, the Pretor rook musters not only in Sicily, but N also in the Isles adjacent and lying thereabout, and fortified with good garrisons all the Towns upon the Sea side which lie toward Greece. Those rumous aforesaid were fed still and maintained by the coming of Attalus the bother of Eumenes, who reported that King Antiochus was passed over Hell spontes with an army : and that the Ætolians were in that forwardness, that they would be prest and ready in arms against his arrival Great thanks were given as well to Eumenes in his absence, as to Artalus there present in place. Also order was taken, that he should have a lodging allowed him at his pleasure, and his charges born for his diet and house-keeping, Moreover, there were given him as presents, two great horses of service, two pair of horsemens armors, as much filver plate as amounted to an hundred pound weight; and of gold plate, as much as weighed 20 pound

And for a fmuch as messengers one after another advertised and gave warning, that war was at hand, it was thought requifite and expedient, that the new Confuls should be chosen in all convenient speed: whereupon a decreeps fied from the Senat, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should forthwith dispatch his letters unto the Conibl, to certifie him of the Senats pleasure, namely, that he should commit the government of his Province and the army unto his Lieutenants, and return himself unto Rome, and in his way send out his writs aforehand for the publishing of an assembly

A general for the election of Confuls. The Conjul obeled these letters, directed forth his summons a general for the election of Comus. The Comput outcomes interest, directed forth his lummons in manner aforefaid, and came to Rome. In this year also great ambition there was, and much fair for the dightiry of government, For that there noblement good for one place, handly. P. Cornelius Scipio the fon of Comus, who the former year had the repulse. L. Cornelius Scipio, and Co. Manlius Volfo. The Confiniship was conferred upon P. Scipio, to as it might appear to the whole world, that this honour was deterred only, and not fully denied to 10 worthy a personage. His adjunct companion in government was M. Acitins Glabrio, a man by calling a commoner. The morrow after were the Pretors choich, to wit, L. Emplin P. Mass, A. Emilias Lepidas, M. Junius Braius, A. Cornel, Mammula, C. Livius, & L. Oppus, both lurnamed Satinator. This Oppius was he that had the conduct into Sicily of a fleet of thirty fail. Mean while that their new Magistrats cast lots for the B government of their Provinces, M. Babin. was commanded to pais over with all his power from Brandafism into Epirus, and to keep his forces about. Apollonia. And M. Fulvius the Pretor of the City had in charge to build fifty new Galeaces called Quinqueremes, of five banks of oars on either fide. And thus verily the people of Rome was provided against all enterprises and attempts of

Neither was Nabis behind for his part in levying war; but affaulted with great force the Town of Gyrheum; and of a mischievous and malicious mind against the Achaans, for sending agarrison to aid the befreged Townsmen, he forraged and Walted their country. The Achaans durif not go in hand with war, before their Embassadors were returned from Rome, and until they might know the pleasure and will of the Senat: but after the return of those Embassadors, they both published C a Diet and general Councel at Sicyone, and also sent their Embassadors to Quintins for his advice and counfel. In this Diet, all their opinions inclined and tended to make wir out of hand: only the letters of T. Quintus made some stay of the enterprise, wherein he advised them to expect the Pretor and navy of the Romans, Now when the States there affembled in coun. el were diffracted, some perfitting still in their former opinion, and others of mind to take with them the advice of him unto whom they had fent for counsel the multitude at length looked what Philopamenes would say in that behalf. The Pretor he was for the time, and in those dayes surpassed all other in wifedome and authority. Then he role up and uled this preface and faid, "That it was a good "custome among the Actolians, and well ordained and provided, that the Pretor himself in all confultations of war should not deliver his own opinion; and therefore willed them of their D sixth the she will be ready to execute with fidelity and careful diligence their decrees according-"ly: yea, and indevor, so far forth as mans policy may reach unto, that they shal not repent of their resolution, be it war or peace. This brief speech of his was more forcible and effectual to incire them to take arms, than any perswasive Oration, wherein he openly could have shewed his desire to follow the wars. And therefore with exceeding accord of all in general they agreed upon war. As for the time and means of managing the same; it was wholly referred to the discretion of the Pretot, to use his own liberty and pleasure, Philopamenes, besides that Quintins so advised, was also himself minded to wait for the Roman fleet which on the Sea side might defend Gytheum: but fearing again that their present necessity could abide no delaies, and left not only Gribium should E be toff, but the garrifon also mifcary, which was feat to the defence of the war, he fer off ore and pur to the Sea the Acheans fhipping. The Tyrant likewife had rigged and dreffed a final fleet to empeach any aid and forcours that haply might be fent to the beneged by Sea, to wir, three covered thips with hatch and deck, three Brigantins of Pinnaces, and as many Gallions. For the old no ips were by composition and covenant delivered up to the Romans. And to make proof and tryal of these new vessels how wift and nimble they were, and with alto see how all things e se were well fitted for a battail, if need were; he made every day certain fliews and representations of fight at Sea, and exercised both mariners and fouldiers by such kind of false alarms: supposing that herein principally confifted the hope of his fiege, in case he could cut off all their aid from the Sea fide. Now the Pretor of the Achaeans as he was equal to any of the best and most renowned comman-Eders and Captains of that time in Land fervice, either for experience and practife, or wit and policy: fo at Sta bewas but a novice and a learner as being an Arcadian born, an Inlander far within themain, and ignorant befides of all forein forces, but that he had born arms and ferved a little in Caup, whileshe had the leading there, of fome auxiliaries. One old Gally there was a Quadri-reme, takena Sea 80 years before, as what time as the caried Nicela the wife of Craters from Nimpation to Corineb, And having heard much talk of this ship (for indeed she had been somefine of great name in the Kings royal fleet) he commanded her, all rotten as she was now, and fendy to fall in prices to be that into the Seaffoin out of the Bay of Argium. This thip as admiral, made way before the reft, wherein Tifo of Paira, a Captain General of a fleet was aboord; and encounted the fhips of the Laconians, making fail from Gnhavm. And at the first she chanced to Gassion and run against a new strong ship, and being old of her fell leaking and taking water at every joynt, the was rent asmoder and fell apieces. All within her were taken prisoners. The rest of the Reet having loft their captainers fled as fall as possibly their oars could make speed and away, Phr-leyamener himself was in a light foilt stjeot of pink and fled amain, and nevertayed until he was arrived at Para. This miling bothing diffouraged and abated the heart of this mortial warrior. who had ran through many and fundry adventures; but contrary wife wrought this effect, that he affired himself and ind, That it he were overtaken and put to the worse in service at Sea, wherein he had no skill, he would so much the rather quit himself so upon the Land (where he had such H experience and was fo ready) as that the Tyrant should not long joy and make boast of his winnings. Nabis puffed up with pride of his fortunat victory, and perfivading himself affuredly that he had no cause to sear any more danger from the Sea, purposed likewise to stop up all the avenues and passages by Land; and therefore beset all the wayes betimes with strong guards, which he beflowed in convenient places. And retiring with a third part of his forces from the fiege of Gribeum, he encamped before Pleia. This is a place that overlooketh and commandeth Leuca and Aera, by which wayes it seemed that the enemies would make their approach with their army, Whiles he kept a flanding camp there, and few of his fouldiers were provided of tents and pavilions, and the rest of the common fort had made them cabins of reeds, wound and interlaced one within another, and the same covered with leaves only to give them some shade; Philopamenes 1 deviled, before that he were discovered and came in fight of the enemies, to affail them at unwares and not looking for his coming, after a new lashion of war that they little doubted. Certain small craies or boats he got together into a secret blind bay, lying within the territory of Argos: in which he bestowed certain fouldiers nimbly appointed, most of them having round bucklers, with flings, darts, and fuch like offenfive light weapons. From thence he coafted along the River neer the shore, until he was come to the promontory or cape adjoyning close to the enemies camp: then he went aland, and by known wayes he came by right unto Pleia: and whiles the watch was fast asleep, as mistrusting no such fear neer hand, he set her upon the cabins aforefaid in every quarter of the camp. Many men were confumed with the fire before they will that the enemy was come: and they that were ware of them, had no means to help and fave their fel- k lows: so with fire and sword all went to wrack. Some very few escaped out of this extremity of danger, and fled to the main camp before Gythaum. Thus Philopamenes having discomfitted and frighted his enemies, led his army forthwith to walt Tripolis in the territory or Laco va, bounding falt upon the confines of the Megalopolitans : and fiaving driven from thence great prizes of men and cattel, he departed before that the Tyrant could fend any guards from thence for the defence of the Countrey. And when he had gathered and affembled his army at Tegen, and published and made known unto the Achai and other Allies, a Diet or general councel to be holden there. whereat also were the chief States of the Epirots and Acamanians: he determined (for almuch as both the hearts of his own people were sufficiently recovered after the disgrace and shameful dishonor received at Sea; and also the courages of his enemies well cooled and they affrighted) I. to lead his forces against Lacedamon: supposing that, that only means to draw the enemy away fro m the fiege of Gythaum. And first he encamped before Ciria within the enemies ground. But that very day was Gythaum forced by the enemies and won. Philopamenes nothing wate thereof, set forward, and encamped neer Barbosthenes, a mountain ten miles from Lacedemon. Nabis also, having gained Gythaum, departed from thence with his army lightly appointed; and marching apace beyond Lacedamon, seized upon a place, called, The Camp of Pyrrhus: which he made no doubt but that the enemies intended to be possessed of. And then from thence he went to meet them. Now by reason of the narrow way, they took up in their march almost five miles of ground in length. At the tail of the army were the horsemen, and especially, where the Auxiliaries marched: because Philopamenes thought, that the tyrant would M charge his men behind with his mercenary fouldiers, in whom he reposed his greatest trust. Two things fell out contrary to his expectation at once, which troubled him much: the one was, that the place was gotten by the enemies before, which he intended to have seized upon for his own advantage: the other was, for that he saw the enemy affront his vanguard inaplace so rough and rugged, that without the guard of his light-armed fouldiers, he could not possibly march forward and advance his Enfigns. Now Philopomenes had a fingular dexterity and skill, yea, and great experience in leading an army, and in making choice of his ground either to pitch or fight: and not only in time of war, but also in peace, he busied his head and employed himfelf principally therein. His manner was, when he rode forth any whither and was come to a fireight paffage hard to pass through, to look every way, and diligently to view and consider N the fituation and positure of the place on all sides; and if he were alone, to cast about and advise with himself; but if there were any in his company, to aske their advice in this wife: What if the enemy appeared and shewed himself in that place; How if he came affront or aslank on this or that fide; nay, How if he should charge upon our back, what were best to be done? It may be the enemies will encounter us directly ranged in battail array; it may be they march diforderly and loofly, minding nothing else but their way, and to travail on. Thus I say, would he either devise with himself or seek advice of other, what place he were best to seize for his own purpose and commodity: also what number of armed men he should need to employ; or what, kind of armour and weapons were needful to use (for therein also lay no small importance.) Moreover, where he should bestow his carriages? where he should lay his baggage? and where he should place and dispose of the multitude that were not meet to bear arms? what fireigth and what manner of guard was needful for their delence? and whether it were more expedient to go forward fill the way that he wasentred into, or better to go back again as he came? likewife, what ground was meet to be chosen for to pitch his camp upon? what compals. and space were necessary to be taken up for the fortification of the place ? from whence he might have convenient watering? from what quarter he might be best provided of sodder and sewel?

A Finally, against the morrow, which way were fafest to remove the camp? and what form and manner of march were best? In these courses and discourses, he had from his childhood so inneed and exercised his spirits, that he was never to seek what to do upon any such suddain occasion or occurrent presented unto him. And now, at this present, seeing his enemies so neer, first and formost he made a stand with his vanguard; then hesent out toward the formost ensigns, his auxiliary Candiots that came to aid him, and those horiemen which they call Tarentin, whose inannen is to have with them, two hopes apiece; and then commanding his own men of armsto follow after, he posteffed himself of a rock standing over a brook or running rill, from whence they might water commodioully; into that place he gathered together all his bag and baggage; there he bestowed all the pages and horse boyes, and followers of the camp, whom he enviro-B ned also with armed men and as the nature of the place would give him leave, he fortified his samp, a Bir, to pitch, pavilions in a traggie, rugged, and uneven ground he found much ado.

Now, were the emenies about half a fulle off: and at one and the same rivulet they watered both, with the guard of their light armed fouldiers: but before that they could confle and skirmish together (as commonly they do when the camps stand so neer one to another) the night overtook them. It appeared plainly there would be tome fighting the next day about the brook for water: and therefore in the night feafon he bestowed close in a valley, farthest out of fight from the enemies, as many of his targeteers's apossibly the place would contain and hide. When day-light was come, the light armed Candiots and those Tarentinhorsemen (of both sides) entred into skirmish upon the very banks of the brook. Letemnastus the Candiot had the leading C of his country-men; Lycoreas the Megapolitan commanded the light horse. The Candiors, who likewise were auxiaries and aid touldiers to the enemies, and the same fort also of the Tarentinhordmen, guarded those that came to water for them. Doubtful was the skirmish for a good while (as being menaged and maintained of the one ide and the other by men of one Nation, and those furnished with the same kind of weapons) but those that were for the Tyrant, were more in number than the other. And by reason that Philopamenes had given charge and direction to the Captains, after they had held skirmish a while, to feem to retreat and flie, thereby to train the enemy into the aforelaid place of ambush, they followed hard in chase upon them as they fled along within the valley, and most of them were either slain or wounded before they saw the enemies hidden there within. Now those targeteers aforesaid, were set in that n order (to far forth as the breadth of the valley would permit) that they might eafily receive their fellows as they fled, within the spaces between their ranks and files. Then at once they arose, fresh in heart, and ordred in good array, and charged upon the enemies, disordered disbanded. loofe, scattered, weary with travel, and faint of their wounds. Then was it out of doubt and palt all peradventure where the victory went: for presently the Tyrant souldiers turned theirbacks, fled a good deal faster than they made pursuit before, and were beaten into their camp: many were either killed or taken priloners as they fled; and they had been put in affright also within the camp, but that Philopamenes commanded to found the retreat, fearing more the rigged and broken ground, and the disadvantage and difficulties thereof in case he had rashly ventured forward any farther, than he did the enemy. Then he, taking his conjecture by the iffue of the E fight, and gueffing by the nature of Nabis the General, in what lear and fright he might be, fent unto him one of his auxiliaries that were strangers, counterfeiting himself to be a renegate revolt, to inform him afforedly, that the A haans determined the next day to march as far as to the river Eurotas, which runneth hard by the walls of Lacedamon, for to flop the pullage, that neither the Tyrant might retire himself into the City when he would, nor any munition or victuals be caried from thence into the camp: moreover, that they would give the attempt, and affay if they could sollicite any of the citizens to revoltsrom the Tyrant. This counterfeit carried himself so in this errand, that the Tyrant believed not so much his words, as took hold thereby of a good pretence and honest occasion for to quit and abandon the camp : and therefore the next morrow, he commanded Pythagoras, with the auxiliary fouldiers and the horsemen, to keep a good guard about F the trench and enclosure of the camp: himself in person with the strength of his army, marched as it were to a battail, and commanded to advance forward the enfigns in all hast toward the City. Philopamenes perceiving that the army marched so fast through the narrow passage down the *or rather Philopamenes hill, put forth all his own horsemen and the auxiliary Candiots, against the guards of the enemies topamin. that warded before the camp. They, leeing the enemies to approach, and themselves for faken of their own fellows, at first went about to retire within their hold: but afterwards when they perceived the whole army of the Achaens advancing against them in order of battail, fearing that they and their tents should be at once surprised, made apace after their own host which was gone a good way before. With that, the targetiers of the Achaans affailed the camp, entred upon it, and ranfacked the tents, whiles the rest went forward and pursued the enemies. The way was

Gluch, as that an army at liberty and free from fear of enemies, might hardly and with much ado

rid any ground and march without encumbrance: but so toon as the skirmish began in the tail of the rereward, and the noise and cry of them affrighted behind was heard in the vanguard :

every man made shift for one, flung away weapons, and fled into the woods on either fide of the way; and ere one could turn about, all the wayes were frewd and choaked up with armour and weapons, and especially with darts or javelins, which lighting for the most part with one end full against the enemies, were in stead of a staked or empalled palaissade to hinder their passage.

Philopemone, having eiten commandment to his light aimled aid foulffiers to prefic forward fills, it and to follow the chair as last as they could (knowing Well that the bottlement would like much add and trouble in their flight) conducted filmtels the shall same and the stilly charged; by a mote open way to the River Empires: Where he encamped himself a first before the going do whof the lin, and there he stated for this light appointed sounders; whom he had kelt troullow after the them mes. Who being come about the time of the first watch befuglit wold of that the Tyran watch fome few was entred into the City, but the unarmed millimide were differled and wandred all a bout the forrest and the woods. Then he willed them to repose and refresh their bodies; which being done, himself chose out of all the souldiers befides (who because they were come first into the camp, had well heartned themselves with taking their resection and some small sleep) certain elect and special men, and took them forth immediatly with him, having about them nothing but i their words, and fet them in good order to keep two port waies, by which men go to Phare and Barbofthenes, where he prejumed that the enemies would take their way and retire themfelves upon their flight: and nothing was he deceived. For the Lacedamonians lo long as the day light lafted had withdrawn themselves to the middle of the forrest, through by-lanes and blind paths; but when the night was once come, and that they descried lights within their enemies camp, they kept themselves aloof over-against them within close and secret lanes ; and when they were once paffed beyond, and thought all to be in fafety and fecurity, they came down into the more open high waies, where they were received and caught up by their enemies that for laied them in ambuth : fo they were every where by numbers either killed or taken prisoners; insomuch as scarce one fourth part of their whole army escaped. Philogemenes having thur up the tyrant close within K the City, spent almost thirty daies consequently ensuing in wasting and spoiling the territory of the Laconians: and when he had thus weakned and in manner broken the back of his enemy, he returned home, and the Acharans held him a paragon, and equal to the Roman General for grorious deeds of arms nay, in the service of the Laconian war they preferred him before the office.

During the war between the Achxans and the tyrant, the Roman Embafindors, who care illly and diligently visited the Cities of the Allies, for fear lest the Ætolians had alienated any of their affections from them to King Antiochus travelled but little in going about to the Acheans, whom by reason of the hatred they bare to Nation, they hoped verily to be faith and faithful entirely unto them in all other things. And first they came to diberts from thence to Chales, and so into Theffaly: and after they had conferred with the Theffanans in a frequent councel of theirs they a turned their way to Demetrias, where there was published a folemn Diet to be holden by the Magnetes. Where they were to frame their speech more curiously than in other places became ertain of their great men and Potentats were estranged from the Romans, and alt ogether made tor Antiochus and the Atolians. The realon was this ; because when news came that Phil phis fon, who was left hoftage with the Romans, should be rendted again unto him, and likewise thettibut remitted which had been imposed upon him, among other false tales and untroths it was reported, That the Romans would redeliver Demetrias also into his hands. And rather then that should come to pals, Eurylochus (a principal and thief man among the Magnefians) and some others of that faction, defired to have a new world and an alteration, by the coming of the Arolians and Antiochus, To these Magnelians, they were to couch and place their words to, in ridding M them of that foolish vain fear which they had conceived, that thereby they did not put Philip clean beside his hope, and so give him occasion to be ill affected unto the Romans; considering that he alone was to them of far greater importance in all respect;, than were the Magnesians, put all together. Thus much only they faid by way of advertisement, That as all Greece penerally was much beholden and bound unto the Romans for the benefit of Liberty, which they by their means enjoyed, fo that City and State especially above all others was obliged unto them For there, not only a garrison of Macedonians had been maintained to keep them in awe, bur also the King had built him a royal palace, to feat himself there, to the end, that they might evermore have in their eye, their Lord to command them. But in vain, and to no purpose was all this, in case the Ecolians brought Amiochus in his stead to make his resiance in the house and palace of y Philip; and would needs entertain a new and unknown King in lieu of the old, fo long a time and fo wellknown. The foveraign Magistrat of that City, they call Magnetarches; and for that time Eurylochus was the man: who bearing himselt big and flout of his high place, said plainly, That he knew no cause, why either he or the Magnetians Ih ould supprets and smother the number that In fo rife touching the delivery of Demetrias into Philip his hands. For rather than to fuffer that, the Magnefians were to oppole themselves, yea, to do and dare any action whatfoever. And in the vehement heat of speech he went so far, that inconsideratly he cast our one word and faid. That Demetrias seemed free in outward shew and appearance, but in very truth was at the command and devotion, yea, and at every beck of the Romans. At this speech there arose a difforant bruit and murmuring of the affembly, which jatred and varied one from another, o whiles some loot hed him up, others were offended, and took it in great despight, that he should presume to utter and speak to much. And Q intins was in such an hear of choler therewith, that firetching forth his hands to Heaven, he called the Gods to witness this ingratitude and distoialty of the Magnefians. At whosewords they were all greatly tetrified. Then Zeno one of the chief, a man at that time of great authority and reputation, as well in regard of the honourable port that he ever caried in the whole course of his life, as also for that he alwayes stood firm and fore

A "to the Roman fide, belought Quintins and the rest of the Embassadors with tears, Not to im-"oute the folly of one man to the whole City, for every man is to bear his own burden, and as he "hath brued, fo to drink, and abide the wart of his own fratching. As for the Magnetians "((aith he) they acknowledge to owe uncooff; Quintim and the people of Rame, not only their "freedom, but all othershings elfe that are most deer and precious unto men. Neither could's "man pray or wish at the hands of the immortal Gods for any thing, which, the Magnetians had "not received by their means and fooner would they like frantick perfons pluck the very heart out of their own bellies, yea; and tear themselves in peeces; before they would violate and break "the amity which shey had with the Romans. This speech of his was followed and seconded with the humble prayers of the multitude. Encylachus departed out of the affembly, and through by-R waves and blind lanes recovered the gates, and from thence fled fleeight into Etolia. For now by this time, and every day more than other, the Ætolians discovered and shewed themselves how they were affected to revolt. And happily at the same time, Thoss, a principal personage of that Nation: whom they had lent as Embassador to King Antiochus, was newly returned, and brought with him Menippus the Kings Embaffador, Who, before they had audience given them in a councel affembled for them. had filled every mans ears and blabbed forth, what forces were prepared both for Land and Sea, what a mighty power was coming, both of foot and horle, how Elephants were ient for out of India and above all (wherewith they thought the minds of the people would be most moved) That there was such a mass of gold brought, as would buy all the Romans out and out. It was easy to see what trouble and broil such language might make in the general diet C and affembly. For the Roman Embaffadors had intelligence, both of their coming, and of all that ever they did. And albeit there was little hope or none at all to do any good, yet Quinting thought it not amiss, that some Embassadors from the allies and associate Cities should be present at that Councel, such as might admonish and put the Ætolians in mind of the Roman alliance and lociety, and not flick to speak their mindsfranckly, yea, and thwart the King his Embassador, The Athenians of all other were thought the meetelt menfor that purpole, both in regard of the authority and reputation of their City, and also for the ancient league between them and the Ætolians. So Quintius requested them to send their Embassadors to the Panatoli in Parliament. When the affembly was met, and the Councel fet, Those first declared his embassage: and after him was Menippus called in, who being entred in place, spake in this manner: " It had been fod. D he) the best course for all them that inhabit both Greece and Affa, that Antiochus had intermed-led in these affairs, during the upright fortune and entirestate of Philips then, every man had "enjoyed his own, and all had not been reduced to the appetite and devotion, nor brought under "subjection of the Romans, And even yet (quoth he) in case ye persist sill in the same mind, and " purpole resolutely to accomplish and finish these your designs and commenced enterprises, pos-"fible it is by the favor and help of the Gods, and by the means of the Acolian affociation, that " Antiochus may recover the State of Greece, crafed as it is, and much broken and bring it again to " her first fresh hue, to her lively and lightsome lustre, which consisteth in true liberty, even that " which is able to stand alone and maintain it self, and dependent not upon the will and pleasure " of others. The Athenians, who first (after the Kings embassage was delivered) had audience given E them and liberty to speak their mind, without making any mention at all of the King, "Ad, ecti-" sed the Atolians of the Roman society, and put them in mind of the savors and good turns done "by Quint us to all Greece in general: advising them to take heed, that without discretion they "overthrew nor the welfare thereof, by running rashly and too soon into a new world of strange "courses and fine devices: for hot, hasty, and heady counsels are at the first fight and ensertain-"ment, pleasant and amiable; in the handling and managing, hard and difficult; in the end and "iffue, heavy and dangerous. Confider how the Roman Embaffadors, and namely, Quimiusa-"mong them, are not far off : and whiles things stand in good terms of integrity, it were better to "treat and debate of matters in question and doubt, by words and reasons, than to set all Assand Europe together to take arms and to make lamentable and deadly war one upon another. The F multitude defirous of a change enclined altogether, and were wholly devote to Antiochus, being of opinion, that the Roman Embassadors were not to be admitted into the Councel: but the more grave and ancient persons of the nobility and states-men, obtained thus much by vertue of their authority. That they should have audience granted unto them. And when the Athenians had made relation of this decree and conclusion passed, Qui, tius was of mind to go into Esolia: for this accompt he made, either to obtain somewhat that he came for, or else to have all Gods and men to bear him witness, that the Romans would enter into the action of war justly, and in manner upon confraint and necessity. "Quintins being thither come, began at first to discourse be-"forethe whole affembly, as touching the fociety of the Ætolians with the Romans, and bow "often they had broken for their parts the faithful accord between them: and whenhe had fo G aid, he used a brief speech concerning the right of those Cities that were in question. And if they thought that they had any law and reason of their fide, how much better (quoth he) were it to fend Embassadors to Rome, either to argue and exposulate the matter with them, or to demand their advice (whether they would themselves) than to cause the people of Rome to make war with Aniachus & the Actolians together, not without great trouble of the whole world & cer-41 tain roin of alk Greece ? For none should feel the smart & calamity of this war sooner than they that are the very causes therof & began first, Thus spake the Roman Embass, by way of prophely, but in visin and so sio effect. After him Those and the rest of that instition, were heard with the is general appliants of est- and they-effected to much, that without any farther protogning of the Diet-and referring the matter to another day, year, and without staying to long until the Romans whether of the place and abtent, they concluded to make a decree, by verme whereof similarity, they concluded to make a decree, by verme whereof similarity for the similar protogname and the fibrolians. This idence was not for proof and infolement to Bonstriau their Pretor accompanied it with as arrogate and reproachful a frump of his own. For when Quintum required of him to see the laid decree, he without any respect of the homomable personage of the man made answer, That for the present time he had somwhat else to do of greater importance; but he would give him the decree and an answer withal shortly, and that within Italy, encamped upon the bank of Thoris. So great a spirit of senselles folly in hose dayes had possessed the mation of the Atolians, I ask their chief Magistrats! Then Quintius and the delegans returned to Cormin.

After the Romans were dismiffed, the Ætolians held no more general councel of the whole Nation, because they would make semblance and seem to do nothing of themselves as touching the cause and question of Antiochus, but sit still and expect the coming of the King. Mary, they treated and debated the matter by their Apocleti (for to they call their special and privy Countel which confideth of certain elect chosen persons) by what means there might be an alteration and change in the affairs of Greece. This was held of all menfor certain, that in every City and State, the chief and the best men generally were for the association of the Romans, and contented them elves with the present condition wherein they stood: but the multitude and those who had not all things to fall out to their own good liking, were definous of a change. And one day K above the reft, the Atolians entred into a defignment and plot, which was not only out of all measure audacious, but also most shameless, namely, to surprise and possess themselves of Demesyins, Chalcis and Lacedamon. And to each of these Cities there was tent one of their principal personages, namely, Thoas to Chalcis; Alexamenus to Lacedamon, and Diocles to Demetrias, This Dibeles had the help and affiltance of Enrylochus abanished man (of whose flying away, and the occasion thereof we have spoken before) who otherwise had no hope at all to return again into his native countrey. The kinsfolk and friends of Euryloches and therest of that faction, upon inthractions given them by his letters, willed his wife and children to prefent themselves in the frequent affembly of the citizens in habit of mourners, in poor array, and vailed after the manner of humble suppliants, there to befeech them all and fome, not to suffer him a guiltless person neither I convicted nor condemned to wax old and pine away inexile. All that were plain and implemen seemed to be conched with pity and commiseration. The wicked and seditious persons conceived fome hope to make a confusion in the State by these Ætolian troubles: in somuch as every one was of opinion and gave his voice, that he should be restored and sent for home. This ground being laid and matters thus prepared, Diocles with his horsemen (for then was he the Captain of the Cavalry) took his journey, under a colour and pretence to reduce and bring home this bariffied person his host and good riend; and in one day and night travelled a mighty great journey, and came within fix miles of the City. And betimes in the morning by day light, accompanied with three elect troops he marched forward, commanding the reft of the horsemen to sollow after. When he approached the gate, he canfed them all to alight on foot and to lead their M horses in their hands by the reins of their bridles, and to go withour order, resembling travailers and waifaring men, fo as they feemed more like to the ordinary train of Captain Diocles, than to the men of arms and warriors under his charge: and leaving one of his troops at the gate, for feat lest the horiemen behind might be thut out, he led Eurylochus by the hand, and brought him through the mids of the City and the market place home to his house: and all the way he was met with many of his lovers and friends that welcomed him, and loved for his return. Anomahe whole City was full of horsemen, and all places of opportunity and advantage were seized and possessed by them. Which done, divers were sent to massacreathe chief of the adverse part in their houses. Thus the Ætolians became masters of Demetrias.

As for Lacedamon, they devised in no hand to force the City, but by some wile to entrap and N Ausprise the tyrant. For seeing the Romans had despoiled him of all his Sea coast Towns: and the Achaens driven him within the walls of Lacedamon, there was no doubt, but who so ever could first take his life from him should cary away all the thanks, and curry especial favor with the Lacedemonians. Good occasion and pretence they had to send unto him a power of armed men, for that he had importuned them by his prayers for fome aids, confidering that by their advice and perswasion he had rebelled. So there were given unto Alexamenus a thousand footmen, and thirty elect horsemen, drawn out of all the flour of the City. Damocritus the Pretor delivered unto them from the privy councel of that nation (of which we have before spoken) "That they "Ihould not believe that they were to be employed in war against the Achaens, or in any other fervice, according as each one might imagine and conceive in his own head: but he charged o "them to be ready to perform and execute obediently whatfoever fuddain defigument Alexante " nws upon the prefent occasion should happen to attempt, were it never to unlooked for strange, "inconfiderate, and andacious: and to reft upon this, That they were fent with him to accom-"philh than, and for no other purpose. Thus Alexannenus with the conduct of these men thus prepared to his hand came unto the Tyrant and no looper was he arrived, but he polletted him presently with a world of hopes: giving to understand, "That Antischer was already passed over

"inco Berope: that shortly he would be in Greece, and oversigned all seasand lands with his ar-"mies and aimados; that the Romans should full well know and find, that they have not now to "deal with fuch an one as Philip; that the numbers of his foot and horses by land can not be "counted. nor his fhips 48 Sea numbred ; that the battail of his Elephants at the very fight will " decide the matter and finifir the war. Moreover, that the Etolians with all their forces, were "ready and preft to come to Lacedamon; (as need required) at any time : but indeed, desirous "they were to thew and muster before the Kingar his arrival, a goodly number of armed fouldiers. Nabis therefore himself should do very well, not to suffer those forces which he had to se decay with long repose and idleness; but being them torch and train them abroad, make them se to run in their armour thereby both to whet and sharpentheir courages, and also to exercise and B" innre their bodies : for by use and custome, the labour will belighter ; and by the courtesy and "gracioushes of their General, nor without delight and pleasure. Hereupon, they began to iffue out of the City, and oftentimes went into the plain lying hand by the River Eurotas. They of the tyrants gnard kept commonly in the battail or middle ward: and himfelf with three horfemen at the utmost (with whom Alexamenus for the most part was) used ordinarily to side before the enfigns, raking furvey and viewing the utmost points and wings of the army. The Atolians were placed in the right wing, as well those that came before to aid the tyrant as those thousand that were newly arrived with Alexamenus. Now had Alexamenus taken a custome, one while to tourney as it were amongst the ranks before in the company of the tyrant, and to instruct him in some mattersfounding to his commodity: otherwhiles, to ride to his own men into the right wing, and C foon again to return to the Tyrant, as if he had given them charge of somewhat necessary to be done. But upon that day which was appointed for to do the feat and murder the tyrant, after he had ridden forth with the tyrant to the usual place, and kept him company a while, he took occasion (as his manner was) to make a step aside to his own souldiers; and then he went in hand with those horsemen which were sent with him from out of Arolia, and said thus unto them: "Now firs; you must adventure and execute that lustily and without delay which you were com-"manded to perform by my direction and leading. Be ready with heart and hand, and be not flack "and idle to exploit that, which ye shall seeme to undertake and enterprise. And look who sever "he be that either standeth still, or wil seem to argue and interpose his own wit and advice to cross "mine, let him make account, he shall never go home again to his own countrey. With that he n fet them all a quaking, for well they remembred what their charge was when they came forth from home. Now was the Tyrant a coming on horseback from the left wing: Then Alexamenus commanded his horiemen to couch their lances down and to have their eye upon him. He also fetled himselfto take a good heart unto him, which was not a little daunted at first with the cogitation of to great a defigument that he had projected. When he was now approached and come neer the Tyrant, he ran with full carrier at him, gored his horie, and overthrew himself to the ground. He was not so soon unhorsed and laid along, but the horsemen stabbed him with many a thrust; whereof the most part did no harm, considering they were driven against his corslet: but in the end they found where his body was naked and unarmed, to he gave his last gasp before he could be releved by his guard in the main battail aforefaid. Then Alexamenus taking with him E all the Ætolians, made all the half he could to possess himself of the royal place. The Pensioners and Squires of the body, feeing this murder done before their eyes, were at first mightily affrighted: but afterwards perceiving the army of the Ætolians to go their wayes and depart, they ran to the breathless carkaie left among them and of men that should have guarded his body and revenged his death, they became a fort of idle gazers and lookers on. And furely there would not a manhave once flirred, in case the multitude had immediatly been called to an affembly; and if after arms laid down; they had been entertained by him with some Oration or Remonstrances framed according to the time: The Ærolians were kept many together, in arms fill, without any outrage or wrong done or offered to any one perion. But all things that they did, haftened the speedy ruin and destruction of those that had committed this fact: as it could not otherwise be in Fallresson, but they should so be served, who had plaid solewd and treacherous a part. The Captain and Ring-leader of all this milchles kepthim leh close thut within the royal palace, spending both night and day in tifling and learching the Tyrants coffers and his creasury. And the Ætolians for their part also fell to ramacking as if they had won that City by assault, which they made countenance and semblance to set free. The indignity of these their pranks, the contempt withal and imall regard made of them, encouraged and animated the Lacedemonians to gather together and consult of the matter. Some were of opinion and said, That the Atolians were to be thrust our by the head and shoulders, and to be sent away with a mischief, and their own liberty to be recovered; which under a colour of being reftored, was intercepted and taken from them: others advised and faid, that for fashion at least wife, some one of royal blood should be set up G for to be the head in this action. Now there was of that race and them one Laconicus a young Child, brought up with the children of the late Tyrant : him they mounted upon horseback, and then they took arms with all speed, and as many Ætolians as they could light upon, wandring here and there in the areets, they ran upon and newed in peeces. Then they affaulted the palace, where they also murdered Alexamenius albeit with some few about him he made resistance and defended himself: The rest of the Ecolians gathered together about Chalcingos (which is a Ohappel of Diana made of brais) and there likewise they were massacred. A few of them

This Enthymidas from Athens (for there he had made choice to dwell) first came to Theber, and to from thence went forward to Salganea, Herodotus abode at Thronium, and not farfrom thence within the gulf of Malea, he had 2000 foormen, and Thoas two hundred horiemen, and about thirty light Caravels. Which Herodotus was commanded to fet over into the Island Atalanta with fix hundred footmen, that from thence, when he perceived once the Land-forces to approach Aulia and Euripus, he might cut over to Chalcis. As for themselves, they conducted the rest of the forces in all the hast they could, and K most by night journies marched unto Chalcis. Militio and Xenoclides (who had the managing of the affairs in Chalcis, and might do all in all there, now that Embymidas was banished I remained in Chalcis, and whether they militrufied tomewhat themselves, or had some inkling and intelligence of the matter, I wot nor, but affraid they were at first, and had no other hope as all but by Hight to fave themselves: how beit afterwards when their fear was well allaied and setled seeing evidently, that not only their own countrey was betraied, but also the Roman society, abandoned, they plotted in this wife, and entred into a course as followeth. It fortuned at the very same time, that a solemn anniversary sacrifice was celebrated at Eretria to the honour of Diana Amarynthis: to which folemnity there reforted not only the inhabitants of those places neer at hand, but also a number of Caryllians. Thither they sent certain Orators, L to request and entreat the Eretrians and Caryflians, both to take some pity of their estate, considering they were born in the same Island, and also to have some regard to the alliance of the Romans and not suffer Chalcis to fall into the hands of the Atolians : who no doubt, if they might get Chalets, would not be long ere they had Eubaa too. Sirly Lords (fay they) were the Macedomians, and rigorous, but the Ætolians would be much more unsupportable. These Cities were principally respective to the Romans, whose vertue and prowels in war, whose justice and bounty in victory they had lately experience of and therefore both States armed the flower and manhood of all their youth and sent them. The Townsmen of Chalcis having committed the guardof their walls to thele, went forth themselves with all their forces passed over Europus, and encamped neer Sale anea. From which place they fent first an herald, and after him Embassadors to the Etolians, M to demand of them, Wherein they had so offended either in word or deed, that their allies and friends should come to molest and affail them so by way of hostility? To whom Those the General of the Ætolians made this answer, That they were not come to annoy and trouble, but to deliver and free them from their servitudeunder the Romans. For bound they were and tied now with a brighter and more glittering chain indeed, but far heavier, than at what time as they had the garriion of the Macedonians within their Castle. The Chalcidians replied again and inferred, whole and only hope was to come upon them on a fuddain and furprise them at unawares teturned home again as they came, being not able to maintain open war, nor to affail a City fo well for N tified both by sea and land, Embymidas being advertised that his country-men lay in camp at Salgames and that the Ætolians were diflodged and gone, retired himself also from Thebes to Athens. And Herodorus likewise, after he had withy and with great longing, expected from * Atalanta certain daies together, to fee some signal (but in vain) sent our a pinnace or brigantine, to know what the cause might be of such stay: and understanding that the enterprise was given over by his complices and fellows in the complot, he returned to Thronium from whence he came, Quintius likewise having intelligence of these occurrents, as he failed with his fleet from Corinth, encountred Eumenes in Euripus neer Chalcis. And thought good it was between them that

that they-neither were in bondage, nonneeded at all the garriion of any. And thus the Emballadors departed from the party, and returned to their own people. Those and the Etolians, whole

And to the end that those persons in Demetrias who sided with him might have some forces for their desence, he wrote unto Eunemus the Pretor of the Thesslians, to put the youth in arms: and he fent Villini before unto Demetria to found their affections, not minding otherwise to give the attempt, unless some part of them enclined to respect the ancient fociety. B The efficient Greece thus interfaced and blanded minist in The affairs of Greece thus interlaced and blended with the Roman, have carried me away as it were out of my lifts; not for that they were to necessary and important to be written, but only becanfe they were material to the cause of the war against Autichus. Atterthe Confuls were elect (for there I began my digreffion) L. Quintim and Cn. Domitup, the Confuls went into their feverall provinces, Quinting in Ligaria, and Domitina against the Boil. As for the Boil, they held themfall product, yea, and the whole body of their Senae with their children, their captains also with their Cavalry, to the number in all of fifteen hundred, yeelded themselves to the Consul. But their Carany, the Ligurians was overrun and waited, and fome fortrelles won whereby not only there were prizes got of all forts, and prifoners taken, but also diverse captives, as well citizens only there were recovered out of the enemies hand. This very year a Colony was planted at Viba, 25 anne of Senst and Commons: and there were thither three thouland and feven hundred footmen, and three hundred horfemen. The Triumvirs, who had the placing of them, were Q. Nevimet, M. Minntins, and CM. Farins Craffipes. Every footman was endued with fifteen acres of land, and the horfemen with twice as much. It was a territory held laft in the tenure of the Brutians,

About the fame time, there hapned at Rometwo molt featfull accidents; the one of them continued long, but was not altogether fo vehement and terrible : for there was an earthquake endured eight and thirty daies. All which time, the lawfleed or vacation from all courts of law and civill causes, continued in great sear and pensiveness: in regard whereof, a supplication was holden for three daies. As for the other, it was not a vain fear, but a very loss indeed that touched ma-D ny men : for there began a scarfire in the beast Market, and continued a day and a night, burning many houses flanding on the Tyber fide; and all the shops and ware-houses, with merchandise of great price, were confamed Now was the year well drawing to an end, and daily more and more the brait and rumor of the war with Antiochus enercaled and likewife the care that the LL of the Senat had therof. And therefore they began to treat as concerning the Provinces of the Migiftrats elect, to the end, that all of them might be more circumspect and intentive to their charges. So a decree pasted, that the Confuls should have the governance of leads, by name, and also to go whis therfoever the Senat should please to dispose of them, and all men knew wel enough, that the war against Amischus was upon the point. Also ordained it was, that he whose lot it was to manage that war, thould have the conduct of four thouland footmen of Roman Citizens, and three hundred horiemen; besides six thousand allies of the Latine nation, and four bundred horiemen. L. Quinting the Confut was appointed to take mufters for those foundiers, that there should be no flar, but that the new Confol might immediatly put himself in his journey, to what expedition soever the Senar thought good. Item, It was decreed as concerning the Provinces of the Pretors, in this manner: namely, That the first lot should affign the double jurissicion, civill and forreign, as well among Citizens as strangers: the second should concern the Brutians: the third, the navy, and the fameto fail whitherfoever the Senat would appoint t the fourth for Sieily the fift for Sardinia: the fixt for the nether Spain, Over and befides L. Quintins the Conful was commanded to enroll two new legions of Roman Citizens, belides twenty thouland foot and eight phundred horsemen of allies of the Latine nation a and this army they set out for the Pretor, who was to govern the Brutii. Two chappels that year were dedicated to Japater Capitalings the one of them L. Farins, Parpareo vo wed in the Gauls war, as Pretor; the other when he was Conful: and Q. Martine Ralls the Danmvir, dedicated them. This year there pailed many tharp and grievons lentences and judgements upon ulmers; against whom (being privat men) M. Taccins and P. Innus Bruns the two Adiles of the chair, commenced action. Of that filver wherein they were fined, was made a chariot with four wheels, guilded , and fet spit was in the Capitollin

Somewhat also he was impeached by a consultation as southing Annibal. For as first he was staid and hindered by occasion of the open thips which he intended to fend with him into Africk. And af-

ther it was good simply to fend him thither at all, or no? This Theas, when Greece was all in an H hurry and full of troubles, bare them in hand, that Demetriae would be in their power and at their devotion. And like as with his leafings touching the King, in multiplying and magnifying his forces: he had brought many of the Greeks into a fools paradile, even fo also after the same maner he ceased not to teed the King with lies, and fill him with hopes, making him believe as all men wished for him with all their hearts, and would run by heaps to the sea strand, to meet him to soon as they could ken his fleet under fail. This felf-fame man was to bold also as to alter the Kings mind "astouching Annibal, which feemed before resolved and settled. For he perswaded him that the "Kings navy was not to be difmembred, and part therefore to be fent away; and if he wereto "make out any of the thips from the reft, yet Annibal of all other was not to have the conduct "thereof, a banished person and a Carthaginian; who was like enough to be of many minds, & "to change a thousand times in a day, such was his present condition and fortune, & such was his " nature and disposition. And as for that glorious name for martiall prowesse (which is the cause "that Annibal is so much set by, and which recommendeth him as a speciall and singular gift to "the world lit is too much, and far unfitting for any one captain under a King : and morement in were that the King himfelf should be regarded and seen above all other, that the King, I say and "none but the King should be the leader, conducter and commander of all. Again, if Annibal "chanced to mileary with a fleet, or to have his forces defeated, the loffe would be accounted no " more then if any other meaner captain had done it : but if the affairs should prosper and sneed " well. Annibal should go away with the honour, and not Antiochus. Moreover, say that fortune "were fo kin has to give Antiochus the upper hand of the Romans, and the entire victory over w "them for ever, what hope or likelihood is there that Annibal would be content to live under the "King and fuo ject to him alone, who hardly could brook and endure the command and foversignof the whole state wherein he was born? He bath not carried himself so, ever fince his first 44 youth, bearing amind to compaffe the dominion of the whole world, as that now in his old age " he can not abide to have a lord and a superior over him. To conclude the King (quoth he) " hath no such need of Annibal in this war, as to make him a commander: wel may he use him for "a counteller, and to forth have him in his train and company; for some mean fruit anduse of such "a nature cannot be cumberforme, burtfull, and dangerous : but if high and great matters be reached at. foon they may bear down and overcharge both the giver, and also the receiver. And no "foirits are fo ready to envy and malice others, as they whole birth and parentage, whole degree L "and estate is not answerable to their hauty minds : and such commonly, as they hate the vertue, o they depresse the good of another. Hereupon their course of sending Annibal into Africk. "was forthwith laid afide and clean cast behind, which was so well devised in the beginning of Antiochus bearing himself alost now, principally for that Demetrias was revolted from the Romans unto the Ætolians, determined no longer to delay the matter, but presently to take a voisge into Greece. But before that he embarked and took the fea, he went up to Iliam from the feafide for to factifice to Minerva; and when he was returned to his fleet, he made fail with 40 clole covered and hatched thips, and 60 uncovered and undecked, and after those followed 200 vellels of burden, charged and fraught with viduals, municion, and warlike furniture of all forts. And fifth he fell with the Iland * Imbros : and from thence he cut over to Soyathos, where after he had rallied his ships which had been scattered one from another in the wide and deep fea, he arrived at Pteleum, the first town of the main and continent. Where Eurylochus the Magnetarches, Tithe loveraign of Magnelia and the principall citizens of the State, who were come from Demetrias. met him and joyned with him; who rejoycing exceedingly to fee fo goodly a company of them in his train, the next day put into the haven of the City of Demetrics; and not far from thence landed all his forces, which amounted in the whole to ten thouland foot, five hundred herie, and fix Elephants: a small power (God wot) and unfficient to leize upon Greece, all naked and alone, far fhorter then to hold and maintain war with the Romans. After it was to noted that Aniochus was come to Demetrias, the Ætolisus proclaimed a councell, wherein they made a decree N to lend for Antiochus. For now the King knowing that they would passe such an Act, was departed from Demetrias, and had withdrawn himself to Phalera within the galph of Maleas And after he had received once the patent of that decree, he went from thence to Lamia, where he was received with exceeding favour of the common people, with clapping of hands, thous, acclamations, and others figns, whereby the multitude used to she w & testifie their great joy. When they were affembled together and fet in Councell, Phanese the Pretor and other chief citizens brought him tolemnly in : where Oyez made, thus the King began his speech, first exusing himtelf, in that he was come with a fir smaller power then all men hoped or looked for. "And e-"ven this (quoth he) may ferve in flead of the greatest argument that may be of my exceeding "love and affection toward you, in that being to unprovided and unfurnished of all things, and o "at a time fo unfeafonable for to fail, as too early to take the fea, I have not thought much but " am willingly come at the call of their Embasi dors : being thus assuredly perswaded, that the E. "tolians feeing me once, will suppose that in me alone consisted all their hope and defence " whatioever. And yet I would a complish I assure you, and satisfie to the full even your contentment alto, whose expectation for the present may seem to have been disappointeds for soon as the

A stime of the year will ferve, and the spring is once come, that the seas are navigable, I will dwerfpread all Greece with men, horfe, and munition; I will take up all the fea coalls with fleets, "I will space for no cost, no pain, no perill, untill I have taken from their necks the heavy yoke of " the Roman empire, let Greece free indeed, and the made the Etolians the chief commanders therein. Nay, with mine armies belides shall come all kind of provision and furniture out of Afia But for the present (laith he) the Etolians must see Stake order, that my people may be served with corn and other victuals at a reatonable rate. To this effect when the King h.d spoken with the great affent of all men, he departed. After the Kings departure, there role fome contention between two great men of the Æcolians, to wit, Phaness and Thous, Phaness was of opinion, that it was better policy to ule Antiochin for a mediator and reconciler of peace, or to be an umpire or B arbitrator to decide the controversies between them & the Romans, rather then to be the General of the war. For his very coming and majetly would be more effectual then all his forces to firike fome reverence in the Romans, and cause them to be respective unto him. For men oftentimes yeeld and remit many things of themselves willingly, to avoid war, which they cannot be forced unto by war and by arms, when they are once entred into action. Those inferred again and faid, that Phaneas ipake not this for any defire & love to peace, but his meaning was to scatter and difpatch this furniture and preparation of war, for this intent, That by this redious lingring, the Kings courage might abate, and the Romans gain time to make them clves ready. For, that there was no reason possibly to be gotten at the Romans hand, they had tried sufficiently by good experience, in fending to many embassages to Rome, and in debating the matter to often with Quintins: neither would they ever have fought unto Antiochus and craved his aid, if all their hope otherwise C had not been cut off and clean bailed. had not been cut off and clean failed. And now fince his helping band is prefented unto them fooner then all men thought or looked for, they were not now to begin to faint and give over, but rather to request and intreat the King, that fince he was come himself in person (which was the greatest matter of all) to fet free and maintain Greece, he would fend for forces both at fea and land. For the King in arms, might peradventure obtein fom thing: but difarmed if he were, little or no reckning would the Romans make of him in the quarreliand question of the Ætolians, no, nor in his own affairs whenloever he should reason and deb tethereof. And here went the bare away. They all opened streightwaies to stile the King with the name of Imperator [AEmperour:] and they choic thirty of the chief perionages to affift him in councell for all things requifit. Thus the Diet was disolved, and every manshipt away and retired to his own City.

D The next day the King fat in a consultation with their Apocletes, in what place they should begin the war. And it was thought best, first to assail the City of Chalcie, which lately the Etolians had affaied in vain. And for to effect this service, there was more expedition and speed required then any other great forces and preparations. Hereupon the King fet forward with 1000 footmen which followed him from Demetrias, and made by the way of Plocis: The Captains of the allo of the Ætolians, having levied some few companies of their youth took another way and met with him at Charonea, and followed with ten covered thips. The King encamped neer Sulganea, and himfelf in person with the chief of the Ætolians crossed the Euripus : and when he was landed and not far gone from the haven, the Magistrats and chief men of Chalen came forth without E their gates, and some few of both sides met together for to parle. The Ætolians were carried to perfusade with them, " That fo far forth as they might without impeaching the Roman amity they would assume the King to be their allie and friend for asmuch as he was passed into Europe "not to make war, but to deliver Greece, and fet it free in very deed, and not in word only and "false semblance, as the Romans had done. And nothing was there more for the good and benefit of the Citiesin Greece, then to entertain the lociety and fellowship of them both. For under the the defence and lafegard of the one, they might be fure to guard themselves from the violence "and outrage of the other. But if they accepted not of the King, they were best to take heed er and fee what danger they prefently incurred : confidering the fuccours of the Rom ins to relieve "them were lo far off, and the forces of Amischus their enemy to annoy them, so neer even at F "their gates, whom of themselves with their own power they were not able to withstand. To this, Millio one of their chief men made this answer : I marvell much (q, be) who they be, that "Antiochus for to deliver and let free, hath taken the pains to leave his own Kingdome, and to " pals over into Europe. For mine own part, I know no City in Greece, that either hath Roman e garriion, or payeth any tribute unto them, or is bound to anjult and unreal onable coverant, or endureth any hards laws and conditions against their wils and therefore the Chalcidians have " need of no person to restore them to freedome, fince they be free already; nor yet of a gar-" riion for their defence, confidering that by the grace and favour of the same people of Rome, they es enjoy peace and liberty already. As for the King, we refuse not his amity, nor yet reject a we the friendship of the Atolians. And we will take it for a speciall point of friendship that G "they that do us, it they gently will depart out of our Iland and be gone : For, as for us, we are re-Clebute in this, not to receive them within our wals, no, nor to contract with them any fociety, without the advice and confent of the Romans. When these matters were related to the King, who flayed behind with the ships, he determined presently to return to Demetrias, for that he was not come with fuch a power as to attempt any thing by forcet where feeing his tirft enterprise came to nothing, he conferred with the Ætolians what was to be done next : & cocluded it was, to found the Acharms, & Aminander the King of the Atlamans. They supposed that the nation of the Bonesians was clean eftranged and hadly affected to the Romans ever fince the death of Barcilla and those troubles that enjued thereupon. They were perswaded also the Philippements grow H potentat, and principal leader of the Achaans, was both malicious and odious unto Quintal for emplation and jelousic of honour in the Laconian war, Aminander had espouled and taken to mite Answer the daughter of one Alexander a Megapolitan, who vaunted himfelf to be descended from Alexander the Great, named his two fons Philip and Alexander, and his daughter Apanes; whom being thus advanced by marriage with a King, her elder brother Philip accompanied into Atbamania. This Philip a vain-headed young man, the Atolians and Antiochus had induced into a foolish hope (confidering that for certain he was of the royall blond) toobtain the Kingdome of Macadony, if haply he could bring about to joyn Aminander and the Athamanians to Antisches. And the le vain conceits of great behelt wrought mightly not with Philip only, but also with A-

Now in Achea there was a councell holden at Egium, and audience given there to the Embaffadors of Anticobus and the Atolians , before T. Quintim. Where the King his Embaffador spake first, and being, (as all those commonly are, that have interteinment and maintenance of Kings Hull of foolish babble, & making sea and land resound again with his vain practing and sensleffe words; fet tale an end, and told them, what an infinit number on horsemen were passing o. ver by Hellespont into Europe : whereof some of them were in compleat harnels, armed at all peeces, whom they call Cataphrafts: others were archers, and that of horieback, against whom there was nothing close, nothing ture enough, who when their backs are turned, and their hories run away, shoot to much the more furely, and even point-plank. And albeit these forces of horse by his report, were sufficient of themselves to defeat all the armies of Europe if they were put to. K gether, yet he addedbelides a mighty number, I wot not how many of footmen: and terrified them with namely a fort of ftrange nations, that fcarcely had been heard of before, to wit, the Dakes, the Medians, the Ælymæans and Cadufians. But for his forces at fea, there was no bayes. "harbors, nor havens in all Greece able to receive them. The Sydonians and Tyrians (fay they) " hold the right fide, the Aradiens, and the Siders out of Pamphylia keep the left; nations for skill and valour at lea incomparable. As for money and other provision and furniture for the wars. "it were needlesse to discourse of, since they themselves knew well enough, that the realms of " Afia have alwaies flowed with gold, as their proper wealth. So as the Romans now were not "to deal with Philip nor with Annibal, the one a chief person among many others of a City; " and the other limited within the confines only of the kingdom of Macedony; but with the great " Monarch of all Asia, yea, and of some part of Europe. And yet he, as mighty a potentatashe is " (not withstanding he is come to the utmost coasts and bounds of the Levant sea, to deliver and " and enfranchite Grecce) demandeth nothing of the Achaens prejudiciall to their fealty and allegeance to the Romans their first allies and affociats : for he required not them to take arms with as him against them, but only not to intermeddle and take part a his seeking is, that (as behoveth " good friends and mediators between both parties) they would all well and peace among them, "and not interpole themselves in a quarrel of war. Archidamus like wile the Emb. sador for the 4 Etohans, requelted in maner the same, that they would hold themselves quiet and in repose (a " thing most easily and safe for them) and being but lookers on the war, wait and attend the issue of others mens fortunes, without the hazard of their own; yet he staied not io, but proceeded so M of far and overshot himself so much in words, that he brake forth at length in ill language, one "while railing against the Romans in general, another while against Quinting in particular; calfing them ungratefull and unthankfull persons, reproaching, upbraiding, and hitting them in the "teeth, how not only they had got the victory of Philip, but also faved themselves by the vertue " and valour of the Ætolians : and as for Quinting, he was to thank them and their means, as much

"he directed all his speech : for the Achaens know very well, that all the valour of the Ætolians "Randeth in bragging words and not in martial deeds, as men that love to be heard in Diets and si assemblies rather then seen in the field and battell; and therefore no marvell if he made so small "reckning to speak unto the Achaans, considering that he knew, how well acquainted they were "with the maners and fathions of the Atolians. But he hath befides vaunted and made great brage " before the King Embassadors, and in their person, before the King himself in absence. And it a "man had not known before, what it was, and had to knit and noted Anticober and the Etolians " together, he might perceive it evidently by the speeches of the Embassadors , for by exchang " lies reciprocally, and by bragging of their forces which they have not, they have inflated and "puffed up one another with vain hopes, whiles they tell and would make them beloeve, That O " Philip by them was vanquished; That the Romans by their valour were protected; and other gay matters, which ere while ye heard building caltles in the air, to the end, that you & other flates or to the Ætolians, and the Ætolians have as lide trufted & relyed upon the vanisy of the King, And therefore the leffe should you be deceived by them, but rather repole your letves assuredly in, the fidelity of the Romans fo often tried, so often known and approved. For whereas they say «It is your best course not to be embarked and interessed in this war, I sside you, there is nothing "more vain then this, nay, nothing so burtfull unto your estate. For you shall be a prize and prey to the victor, without thank of either part, without any worth and reputation. Quinting was thought by the Achgans to have spoken not impertinently, but to have answered them both; fully: D and an easie matter it was to approve his speech unto those, that were well-enough enclined to have given him gentle hearing : for that it was no queltion nor doubt at all, but that every man would judge them to be friends or enemies to the Acharan nation, whom the Romans held for theirs : yes, and would conclude in the end of an act, to denounce war both sgainft Anticobus &

the Ætolians. Moreover, according as Quinties thought good, they fent prefently an aid of 500. fouldiers to Chalcie, and of as many to Pyreeum. For at Athens there had like to have been a fedition and mutiny, whiles some drew the multitude (which commonly is bought and fold for mony) to take part with Antischus upon hope of large rewards and great bounties, untill such time as Quinting was fent for by them that took part with the Romans, in fo much as Apollosoras (who gave council and pertwaded to revolt) was accused by one Leon, and being condemned, was E banished. Thus verily the embassage returned from the Achzans to the King with present answer. The Becotians delivered no certainty tthis only was their answer. The when Anticobus himself was come in Bassia, then they would confider and confult what they were belt to do.

Antiochus being advertised, that both the Achzans and King Eumenes also had sent men for the defence of Chalcie, thought good to make half, that his forces might not only prevent them, but allo if it were possible receive them and cut them short as they came. And for this intent, he fent Menippus with three thousand fouldiers or there bout, and Polyxenidas with his whole fleet. Himself a few dajes after marched with fix thousand of his own fouldiers 3 and of that levy, which on a laddsin might be gathered at Lamia, no great number of Etolians. Those five hundred Acheuns aforefaid, and the intall aid that King Eumenes fent under the conduct of Xenoclides the F Chalcidian, having fafely paised Euripus before that the waies and paisages were beter, arrived at Chalcu. The Romans also who were upon five hundred, at what time as Menippus enc imped before Salgama, Came to Hormoum, where is the paisage out of Bassia into the Iland of Eubera, In their company was Million tent as Embassador from Chaleis to Quintins, for to crave some faccour : who perceiving that the waies were laid and the freights kept by the enemies, leaving his intended journey by the way of Antis, turned to Deliams, miliding from thence to cut over into Endea. This Delium is a temple of Apollo fituat upon the feaftrand, and five miles diffant from Tanagra, from whence there is a short-cut (little more then a league) over an arm of the sea unto the next parts of Euban, In this Temple and facred grove about it, for eligious, fo priviledged and secured (as are those franchised houses and sanctuaries which the Greeks call Agla) and G at that time, when neither war was proclaimed, or at least wife not fo fac proceeded, as that in the hearing and knowledge of any manthere had been (word drawn, or blood shed in any places

In this place, and at this time, I (ay, whiles the fouldiers wandred at their leifure and pleafure, some gone to see the temple above said and the grove, others walking upon the strand unarmed, and a great fort allo of them feattered over the fields / (ach as were gone for forrage, and fewell) all on a fiddain Messippes finding them loose and distranded, charged upon them and flew them, and to the number of fifty he took alive: very new escaped, among whom was Millio, who got into a fmal veffel of merchandife. This occurent, as it troubled and difquiet. ed Onimism and the Romans, for the loffe of their fouldiers, to it feemed much to excease the right of their full quarell to make war upon Antioches, Antioches having advanced his army, and anproached Antis, after he had once again addressed Orators, Partly of his own subjects, and partly Atelians to Chaleis, for to follow those causes which of late he had commenced, but in more minatory terms, now prevailed cafily, not withfranding Millio and Xenaclides laboured to the contrary, that the gates should be set open unto him. All those that were for the Romans, abandoned the City alittle before the Kings coming. The fouldiers of Achea and King Eumenes, kept Saleanea The Rom, fouldiers also who were but few fortified and made a sconce upon the water of Enrique, to be a defence for the paffage. Menippus began to affail Salganes, and the King him. felf to fet upon the fort of Euripus aforefaid. The Achzans and fouldiers of Eumenes first grew to I composition, and having capitulated to depart without any harm, quit their place of garrison The Romans held out longer, and frontly defended the hold of Euripus: but even they also being to streightly invested both by land & water, and seeing now the ordnance and engine of battery. brought and ready to be planted against them, would no longer endure the fiege. When as now the King had poffeffed himfelf of the City of Enbas, all the other Cities of that Island, refused not to inbmit and come under his subjection. And he thought he had made a good beginning and entrance in this war, in that fo great an Island, and so many Cities commodiously seated, and of fuch importance, were reduced un der his obeifance.

The fix and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

O loon as P. Cornelius Scipio the fon of Cnem, and M. Acidim Glabrio, that wo Confols M. were entred into their magistracy the LL of the Senat enjoined them (before any speech & question moved as touching the provinces) to facrifice greater bealts in all those temples. wherein the cultom was for the more part of the year to celebrat the folemnity of bectifterns, and to make their praiers in this maner, That whereas the Senat intended a new war, the gods would vouchlafe to bleffe and happily conduct the fame to the good and publick weal of the Senat and people of Rome. All those facrifices proved good and as they ought to be teven the very first bealts that were flain, prognosticated fortunat successe, and she wed apparent signs that the gods were pacified and well pleased. And thus the southsiers and bowel-priess, out of their learning, answered, It was evident, that by this war the bounds and limits of the Roman empire should be extended, and that both victory and triumph was forefignified. These answers being N reported, and mens minds fetled, and their confeiences refolved of all feruples as concerning the gods, then the LL. of the Senat granted out an order, that a bill fhould be preferred folemply anto the people in this form; Plasfeth it you, and is it your will, that war feeald be enterprised against Antiochus, and all that take his part? And if this bill paffe and be granted, are ze pleafed, that the Confuls, if they think fo good, refer the whole matter unto the Senas to take order for the managing thereof accordingly? P. Cornaline propounded this bill, and the people accepted therof. Whereupon the Senat fet down a decree that the Confuls should cast loss for the government of Italy and Greeces and that he whole hap it was to govern Geese, should over and above that number of fouldiers, which L. Quimim by authority and commission from the Senat had for that province cither enrolled or levied receive that army also which M. Babius the Pretor caused to palle over the year before into Macedony, by vertue of an order from the Senat, in that behalf enacted. And license he had, if need so required, to take up sid-souldiers from among the allies without Italy, to as he exceeded not the number at five thouland. Also agreed it was, that L. Quintins the Conful of the year before, should be deputed lord General for that war. As for the other Conful, unto whom had been allotted the charge of Italy, he was commanded to levy war against the

Co. miss conducted : and when he had received one, to find the other to Rome, that those legions of Citizens should be in readings for to be fent whither it pleased the Senat. This order being taken in the Senat, astouching the appointment and affiguration of those provinces, then it was taken in the beat the new Confuls final cast lots for their governments. To Acilins besel Greece, and Italy to Cornelius. After this by a speciall lot there passed an act of the Senat, That whereas the people of Rome had ordeined to wage war at that time ag .init King Antochus, and those that were under his dominion, the Confuls thould caute a procellion to be toleranzed. Alfothat the Conful M. Actim should conceive and make a vow to Impiter, for to celebrat the great Games in his honour, and to bring offerings to every altar. This vow was by him pronounced in this form g of words, according as P. Liemius the Arch Priest endited and prompted unto him. If that war which the people hath determined to be enterprifed and made against King Antiochus, Ball be performed according to the mind and contentment of the Senat and people of Rome, then hall the people of Rome celebrate unto thy honour, O Jupiter, the great Games for the space of ten daies tegether, and oblations shall be brought to every Altar, of that price and amounting to that sum which the Senat (ball ordain and fee down. And what Magistrats soever shall exhibit those Games, or sn what place, yea, and at what sime foever they hallbe represented, the same Games shall be held for good, and reputed as well done, yea, and the offrings accepted as rightly presented. After this, there was published and proclaimed by both Cost. a supplication for the space of a daies. When the Coff. had calt lots for the parting of their governments, the Pretots likewise went presently about the lame for their provinces. To M. Junim Bruins fell both the jurisdictions, as well of C Citizens as aliens. A Cornel. Mammula had the charge of the Brutii, M. Emplus Lepidus of Sicily, and L. Oppins Salinator of Sardinia, C. Levins Salinator was L. Admiral of the navy, and L. A. myling Paulus governor of the nether Spain. And in this manner following, were the armies and forces distributed and appointed. Unto A. Cornelius were assigned the new fouldiers which the former year L. Quimius the Conful, by vertue of an Act of the Senst, had entolled. And his commission was to defend and keep in order all that tract and coast about Tarentum and Brundassum. As for L. Emplins Paulus, who was to take a voiage into the farther Spain, he was allowed (befides the rmy which he was to receive of M. Falvinishe Pro-Pretor) to have the conduct of three thouland new fouldiers footmen, and three bundred borfe : fo that of them, two third parts thould confift of allies of the Latin nation, and one third of Roman Citizens. The supply was D fent unto C. Flaminins into the higher Spain, whose commission was renewed for to have the command therestill. M. Emplins Lepidus had commandment to receive the government of the province, and withall, the conduct of the army, arthe hands of L. Valerius, whom he was to succeed; and if he thought so good, to keep with him in the Province L. Valerius, in quality and and place of a Vice-Pretor: and to to divide the province, that the one part should reach from Agrigentum to Pachinus ; the other half from Pachinus to Tyndarium talfo, that L. Valerius should defend the fea-coalts and the river with a fleet of twenty Gallies. The fame Pretor aforefaid was to levy and gather a double tenth of corn, and to take order for the convoy thereof to the fea, and to to be embarked and transported into Greece. The like commission had L. Opimins, to exact E and take another tenth in Sardinia : but that grain was to be brought to Rome, and not to be carried over into Greece, C. Liveus the Pretor and Admiral of the navy, was appointed with 300 fail ready rigged and trimmed, to fail into Greece with all ipeed, and to receive the thips that Acilian had: likewife to repair, rigge and furnish the old veffels that rid in the habors, or lay at one fide up in docks. M. Janius the Pretor his charge was, to levy marriners and rowers from among the libertins, for to terve that Armado. And there were fent Embalfadors into Africk to Carthagh. and into Namidia, three into either part, for to feek and purvey corn to be fent into Greece, for which the people of Rome would make prefent payment. And to wholly implayed was the City to prepare and take order for this war, that P. Cornelius the Conful published an Edich, that no Senators, or any that had suthority to give their opinion in the Senat, neither any inferior Magi-E ftrais, should take any journey out of the Cky, farther then they might have return again the sameday : Item, that there should not be five Senators abient at once from Rome,

C. Livins the Pretor, whiles he ofed all diligence and care to prepare and provide his fleet, was empeached and hindred a time, by occasion of a debate and contention that arose between him and the Coloners of the sea-fide. For when they should be gathered and sent to sea, they appealed to the Tribunes of the Com. from whom they were put over and referred to the Senat . and the Senat with one voice and accord pronounced and determined, that these Coloners were not exempted from fea-fervice. The Colonies that contended with the Pretor about their imminity were thele, Hoftia, Frogena, Caftrum novum, Pyrgi, Antium, Tarracina, Miniurua and

This done, the Conful Acilius by order from the Senat, confulted with the colledg of the Fechies or Heralds at arms, and demanded their advice, Whether the war should be proclaimed and defiance given to Ausice has munfelf in person; or it were sufficient, to intimut and denounce the same to some one of his garrisons? Also whether they would advise to proclaim war against the Acolians apart by themselves : or whether it were not meet and convenient first to disclaim and renounce their lociety and friendship, and then to proclaim and denounce hostility? The Fecials answered, that heretofore they had determined and elected this point, at what time as 737 their opinon was touching Philip, to wit, That it was all one, and made no matter, H whether the defiance were given him to his face, or only intimated to fome garrifons of his And as for the Etolions, this was their mind, that they had quit already their amity, and abandoned all fociety, in that when our Embafladors fo oftentimes had redemanded amends for wrones done, they never thought good to make restitution on latisfaction. Moreover, the Atolians had themselves sent defiance first and proclaimed war against the Romans, when as by forcether feized Demetrias a City of our allies, and advanced before Chalcu, to affail it both by land and fea; and lattly, in that they had follicited King Antiochus and brought him into Europe, for to levy war against the Romans. All things now being sufficiently provided, M. Acilim the Conful published an edict and proclaimed, That all those fouldiers whom L. Quintius had enrolled, likewise all those whom he had levied of the allies of the Latine nation, who, were to go with him into his

Himself upon the * fifth day before the Nones of the fame month departed forth of the City clad in his tich coat of arms. And at the same time the Pretors also took their journies into their severall provinces. Much about that time there arrived at Rome Embaffadors from two Kings, to wit, Philip of Macedony, and Ptolomae King of Egypt; promiting their aid of men, money, and corn for that *36000 pound war. And befides from Prolomans there was brought * 1000 pound weight in gold, and the ferling, after weight of * 2000 pound of filver: howbeit nothing was received, but much thanks rendred to *60000 pound both the Kings. And whereas both of them offred to come with all their power into Atolia. and to be there in person, Ptolomee was discharged of that offer of his, but the Embassadors of Philip received this answer, That he should highly please and content the people of Rome, in case he would not fail the Conful M. Actius. In like manner there came Embaffadors from the Carthaginians and Mafanissa. The Carthaginians made promise of a thousand Modii of Wheat, and that here wan- of Barley five hundred thousand for the army, and likewise to bring half so much to Rome; praying the Romans to accept the same at their hands as a free gift and gratuity. adding moreover, ber, vig. 100. that they would man out a fleet at their own charges, and were ready also to make one entire payment of their tribute behind, which they were of duty to pay by fundry terms of many years. The answerableto Embassadors of Masanssa, promised in the behalf of their King, to send five hundred thousand of the reft that Modii of wheat, 30,000 of barley, into Greece to the army, belides 500 men of arms and followeth, nor twenty Elephants, unto M. Acilius the Col. As touching the corn, this answer was returned t to the magni- unto them, that they were content to accept thereof, fo that they would take, money therefore to the worth. Last of all concerning the tribut mony, none would they receive whear, who before the day. Whiles the affairs paffed thus at Rome, Antiochus being at Chaleis, because he would not fit still and do nothing, all a winter time, partly himfelf follicited (by fending Embaffadors) the minds of

The embaliage of the Epirots, plaid with both hands, meaning to deal roundly and fimply with no lide, but to go between the bark and the tree. Gladly they would make court to the King and curry favour with him, but fo, as they food " in good terms still with the Romans, whom they were loth to offend. For their request to him "was, that he would not draw them without great and important cause into the quarrell, confi-"dering that they for the defence of all Greece lay open and exposed to Italy, and were lare before "others to feel the Romans fingers, and receive their first affaults. But in cale he were able of " himself with his forces by land and sea to defend Epirus, and furnish it with garrisons sufficient, "they would with heart and good will accept of him and his into their Cities & port-towns: but N " if so be he could not effect that, they belought him not to offer them, naked and unarmed men, to the violence of the Roman wars. Their drift was in that emballie (as it appeared) that if the

I are, entire, and at their own liberty for the Roman armies, and win withall the Kings good grace in that they feemed to make an offer to deceive him : or if any came indeed, yet they might conceive good hope to find favours, and have pardon at the Romans hands, in that they had not expected their fuccours being fo far off, but rather yeelded to the forces of Antiochne being present there in person. In such fort they carried themselves in their embassage so perplexed and intricat, that the King knew not well how to answer them readily: but said, that he would fend his own Embassadors unto them for to parle and treat of all affairs perteining in O common as well to them as to him. Then went be himself into Beatia, which countrey in colour and the w pretended thefe causes of anger and spight against the Romans, that before I have mentioned, to wit, the murder of Barcillas, and the armies by Quintins levied against Coronea, occafreed by a malsacre committed upon Roman fouldiers; but in very truth this was the reason, hagalar silcipline and order of that nation in old time, was going downward and endlong

Where in the General Diet and Councell of that Nation (notwithstanding he had founded the barreil, and began the fray already by giving the first blow, in that he'h of forced the Roman gartilon neer Delium and Chalcia, which were no imalifigus nor doubtfull overtures of war, yet hebegan with the same kind of speech he first used in the party and conference at Chalese, and which his Embassacors had followed in the general assembly of the Acharans, namely, demanding that they would enter into amity with him, without professing themselves enemies to the Romans, or pretending hollility against them. But there was no man there but soon found him and faw him welenough: howbeit there passed an act and decree in favour of the King against the B Romans, anders vain and flight pretext and colourable shew of words. Having gained this nation allo, he returned to Chaleis, from thence he fent our his letters before unto the States of the Etolians, that they should meet him in Demetrias, where he would confer and consult with them of all their affairs to be managed; and thither came he by feast the day appointed. Aminander also was fent for out of Athamania to this confultation, yea, and Annibal the Carthaginian (whole countel was not required a long time) was pretent at this frequent Diet and Affembly. Much parle and great opening there was as touching the nation of the Thefalians; and all there in place were of opinion, that they should be founded how they stoods feeded ; but about the maner and some circumitance thereof, they were of divers minds, while some advited it to be done and executed out of hand : others thought good to put it off from winter (cafon (confidering now they were in the mids thereof) unto the prime and beginning of ipring e others again (aid, that Embishadors Conly should be tent: and some hot sputs there were, that gave counsell to go against them with all their forces, yes, and to fright and terrifie them if they made flow half. Now when all the knot and difficulty of this deliberation confliteth in one point, Annibal was requested by name to deliver his mind and speak to the cause in question; who turned the King and all that were prefent from other wandring cogitations, and induced them to the entire confideration of the totall war; and to this effect framed his speech in this wile. "If lines the time that we passed over The speech of "into Greece, my hap had been to be called to any conneell, when as forme question was touching dualital " Eubea, the Achaan; and the Baotians, I had delivered that advice then, which now I purpole to acter this day in the question concerning the Thessalians. Above all things my counsell is, "that Philip and the Macedonians may by all means possible be wrought to this our association Du in the war. For as touching Enbes, the Bzotians and the Thefalians, who doubteth, but that "they (as nations that fland apon their own bottoms and are of no force by themselves) will alwaies flatter them that are present in place; and be ready to crave pardon upon the same fear

The Etolians "(I tay) who as all the world knoweth vanquished Philip, shall now rogether with Philip, enter into arms and fight against them. Over and besides, Aminander and the whole nation of the A-"thamans (who elervice in the war, next to the Etolians, flood the Romans in best stead) hall be on our fide, Philip at that time (O King Antiochus) full timed the fight and burden of the whole " war, when you fat fill and firred not a now both of you together, two most mighty monarchs, F " with the pullfance of all Afia and Europe, thall wage war against one City and people, which to "speak nothing of mine own fortune good or bad) certainly in our fathers daies was not able to " make their part good with one only King of the Epirots; how hardy loever they will be when "they that be matched with you both together. And (now " things standing as they do) my advice is, that you fend for all your forces both by land and fea. "Let your carriks and hulks with victuals and provision follow after your armado & ships of war. "For in this place, like as we are too few to perform any martiall exploits, fo we are too many, " confidering our smal store of victuals. And when you rallied and united all your force together, "divide your navy in two parts: the one you shall keep in the rode of Coreyra, to impeach the Ro-" mans, that they shall not passe in lafety and security, the other you shall cause to fail unto that "coast of Italy which looketh toward Sardinia and Africk. Your felf in proper person, with all "your land army shall march onward into the territory of the Bylliones: thence shall ye have good " means for the defence of Greece, as making the Romans believe, that your are upon the point w to pass the seas, yea, and being ready indeed to crosse over if need should require. This gene-" rally is my counfell; mine, I fay, who as I will not take upon me a fingular skill in all kinds of war, " fo me thinks I should know how to war with the Romans, as having learned my skill thereby, s as well to my coft as advantage, and as much with my good as harm, & look what loever defign-" ment I have projected unto you, I promise and protest, that I will be faithfull and forward in " the execution thereof: and the gods approve and bleffe that course, which your self shall think " the best. To this effect, in a manner, was the oration of Annibal directed; which all that were in place and heard it, rather praised for the present, then put in practise and effected afterwards. For no one thing was done of all that he had faid, fave only Antiochus ient Polyxenidas for a navy and army out of Asia; yes, there were Embassadors also dispatched to the General Diets of the L Theffalians. And a day was appointed for the Etolians and Ammander to meet the army at Phera, whither King Antiochus came streight after with his power. And whiles he staied there expecting Aminander and the Etolians, he fent out one Philip a Megapolitan, with two thousand men to gather out the bones and reliques of the Macedonians about Cynofcephala, where the war with Philip was determined, and the quartel decided by a famous battell : were it that therein he followed his own head and took a conceit, thereby to wind himfelf into grace and favour with the Macedobian Nation, and to bring the King into obloquie and difgrace, because he left his souldiers unburied for that, as it is the vein (or vanity rather) engraffed in Kings by kind, he fet his mind and busied his spirits in matters, for apparence gay and goodly, but in effect fond & foolish. There he made a mount (as it were) of a number of bones gathered together into one place, that lay leat- M tering and strewed here and there : a thir g no doubt) that the Macedonians conged him no thank for, and which Philip (you may be fure) took in foul forn and malicious diffain. And therfore Philip, who at that time minded to take counsell of Fortune, and to be directed by her, as the enclined now, lent to Marcus Babins the Vice-Pretor, and advertised him, how Antioches invaded The falie, and if it pleased him to stir out of his winter habour, he would meet him, that they might confer both together what were best to be done.

While Antiochus lay now encamped before Phera, where Aminander and the Etolians had joyned with him, there came Embassadors from Lariffa, expostulating, Wherein the Thessalians had to offended either by deed or word, that he would moleft and trouble them with war? and withall befeeching him to retire & withdraw his forces, and debate the matter (if he had ought against them) by his Embassadors. At the same time they sent five hundred men in armes, well appointed, under the governance of Hippolochus, to lie there in garifon, who because they could not paisthither, by reason that all the avenues were seized and kept by the Kings forces, returned to Scotufa, As for the Embaffadors of the Lariffans, the King made them a gracious answer, and said, That he was entred into Theffals, not by way of hostility to distresse them, but in friendly manner to maintain and establish the freedome of the Theffalians. Likewise he sent an Embassador to Phere, to fignifie fo much to them and in the fame terms. But the Phereans giving him no anfwer again, difpatched unto the King an Embaffador of their own, one Panfanias, a principal man of their City. Who after he had pleaded the temblable remonstrances to those, that had been in the like case alledged and laid forth in the behalf and name of the Chalcidians, in that Councell holden neer the ftreights of Euripus, and besides, uttered something else with more boldnesse and courage; the King dismissed him, after he had willed them to consider more of the matter, and be well advised, that they took not that counfell which anon they would repent, whiles they fought to be too wary, provident, and forcasting the future time. When this embaffage was related at Phera, the Citizens took no long time to deliberat, but soon resolved in the maintenance of their faith and loisly to the Romans for to undergo whatfoever hazard

The five and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A the fortune of war should present unto them. Whereupon both they addressed themselves to defend the City with all their might, and also the King began to assult and batter the wals on all parts at once. And knowing well enough (as in truth there was no doubt) that in the iffue of the parts at outer that the first enterprised; lay the whole importance and consequence of all, either to make him definited ever after, or feared and dread of the Thefalians, therefore he terrified the befieged inhabitants, on every fide, and by all means possible that he could device. The first assault they fulfained frontly and manfully but afterwards seeing many of the defendants were either overturned and flain, or grievoully hurt and wounded, their hearts began to quail. yetreclaimed by the rebukes and chaltifements of their captains and leaders, and animated by their effectual exhortations, to perfift fill in their purpole and refolution, they quit the utmost compats

B of their wall (leeing a what default they were for want of men) and retired themselves more inward into the City, into one partthereof, which was ftrongly fortified with a mure and lefs circuit and compass then the other. At the length, overcome with travell and calamities, and fearing that if they were forced and taken by assuit, they should find no mercy por pardon with the conqueror, they yeelded themselves. The King following the train of victory, delaied no time, but whiles the fright was fresh, fent four thousand armed men presently to Scotusa, where the townsmen made no stay, but rendred the town and themselves incontinently, having before their eies the fresh bleeding, example of the Phereans, who tamed by mere force and wofull miferies, were compelled to do that at last which they obstinatly refused at the first. Together with the City it felf was surrendred also Hippotochus and the Larits an garrison under his hand. All of

C them the King feat away without any hurt or violence offred unto their perions : for he thought therby to win the hearts and love of the Latis zans. Having accomplished these exploits within ten daies after his first coming to Phera, he marched towards Crano with all his army, and at his fift coming won it. Then he reg ined and leized Cypers and Metropolis, and the borroughs & forts about them . fo as now all those quarters were subdued and put under his subjection, except Assaw and Gyrso. Then he determined to assail Lariffs, supposing, that either upon the fearfull terrour of other Cities forced, or in regard of his demerit in difmiffing the garrison so contreous ly, or by the present example of so many Cities yeelded note bim, they would not long persist in their obstinacy. And for to terrifie them the more, he commanded the elephants to march in the forefront of the vanguard, and approached himself in a square battell, with four fides, in such D fort as the hearts of many of the Livis 2 answaved in doubtfall suspence, between forced fear of present enemies, and kind regard of absent friends. In this time Aminander, with the whole youth and manhood of the Athemans, became mafter of Pelineum. Menippus also with three theusand Etolian footmen and two hundred horse went to Perrhabia, won Mallas and Cyretic by alsault, and walted the territory of Tripolis. Having performed these exploits with great expedition, and celerity, they returned to Lariffs unto the King, and arrived even then when as the King was in confultation what to do with Larifla: for the councell was divided into diverse opinions. Some thought it good to proceed forcibly, and not to defer and assail the Cities wals with fabricks and engins of battery on all sides at once: alledging that the town being fituated in a plain towards the champain field fide, might be ap-E proached unto with ease and invested every way. Others again inferred one while, that there was nocomparison between the strength of this City and of Phere: otherwhile, that it was now wenter time, and a featon of the year far unfit for warlike executions, and most of all other for the frege and assault of Cities. As the King thus hung in the equal ballance of hope and despair, the Embafeadors of Pharfalus arrived, who, 18 good hap was, being come to furrender up their town, to vived his spirits and mightily comforted his he rt.

M. Babins in this mean while having parlied and conferred with Philip in the Dalsaretians countrey, tent Appius Claudius by the common advice of them both, to the succour and defence of Laviffa; who prised through Macedony, and by long journies came to the top of those hills that command Gonni. Now this Gonni is a town twenty miles diffant from Lariffa, feated jult F in the very streights of that forrest and passe called Tompe; who having taken up a larger circuit of ground to encamp in then was proportionable to his number, and made more fires in shew then need was for that company, gave semblance unto the enemie (which was the thing he aimed at) that all the Roman forces were there, together with King Philip. King Antiochus therefore pretending noto his army, that the unfeatonable winter that approached, after he had flayed one only day before Lawiffa, diflodged, and thence departed, and to returned to Demetrias. The Rtolians likewife and Athamanians repaired to their own countries.

Appine, albeit he faw that the fiege was levied (which was the only canfe of his coming) yet down he went to Larifa to encourage and confirm the hearts of the allies against the time to come. And a two-fold joy there was, both because the enemies were gone and had quit their coune try, and also for that they faw the Roman garrison within their wals. King Antiochus departed from Demetrias to Chaleis, where he fell in f. ney and love with a damfell of that City, daughter of Cleoptolomus a Chalcidian. Now after he made means to the maidens father first by intercelfion of mediengers and mediators, and siter by importuning him in his own person with earnest requests by word of mouth (who was very both and unwilling to entangle & tie himself, in matching her to high above his own calling) at length to overcame the man, that he obteined his defire: and as if it had been a time of fetled and confirmed peace, he proceeded to confummate and celebrat the murriage. And forgetting clean, how at one time he had undertaken the charge of two. H affairs to important, to wit, the war with the Romans, and the deliverance of Greece, he passed away the relt of the winter in feafts and bankets, and in those delights and pleasures, which ordinarily (you wot well follow mean the liberall drinking of wine : 150, and when he had thereby rather wearied his body then fulfilled his appetite he gave him felt tollace without compant. The like riot and loofe life took hold of the rest of the Kings captains, by example in all places, but in Bastia especially, such as commanded the garrisons. Nay, the very louditers were let hoose and given over to take voluptuous waiss, and not one of them would put on armor, keep the watch attend the guard, or do any thing pertaining to the duty and charge of a fouldier. And therefore at the beginning of the fpring, when he was come by Phocis and Cheremen, to the Randez. 2014; when be had appointed from all parts his forces to meet, he foon perceived that the fouldiers had from the winter as licentiously as their leaders, and kept no better order and ftreighter discipline. Then he commanded Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian, to lead the army to Strains, a town in Reolia. Himfeli having done facrifice at Delphi to the honour of Avalla went forward to Naspallum. And after the Diet holden of all the States of Atalia, in the way which leadeth to Strains, along by Chalcis and Lyfimachia, he encountred his own forces aforefaid, that came by the gulf of Malea. Where Mnefilosbus, a Principal Acarnanian, but wronels and bought with many gifts and prefents, not only himfelf won that nation to take part, & to fide with the King, but also had drawn to his own mind and affection Chese their Pretor, who at the time had the loveraign rule there, and might do all in all. He feeing that the Leucadians (who are the chief of all the Acarnanians) could not be easily induced not brought to revolt, for the awe wherein they food of the Romanfleet, which either was with Attilias, or about Cophale. mis, went cunningly to work with them. For having delivered his opinion in their general Councell, that the inland parts of Acarnania were to be well guarded and defended, and that as many as were able to bear arms should go forth to Medie and Tyrkeam, for fear those places should be seized by Ansackue and the Etolians: there were again some who made answer and faid, how there was no such need that all should be raised and levied so tumultuously in ball, for a garrison of five hundred men was sufficient. And when he had obteined that number of young & able men, he placed three hundred of them in garrison at Medie, and two hundred at Theorems his reach and drift was to have them put into the Kings bands for holtages. And even at the time arrived the Kings Embaffadors at Medio, whole embaffage being heard, they laid their beads I. together and consulted in the publick affembly what answer to return unto the King. Some were of opinion to continue still in the Roman fociety; others were of advice again, that the Kines offer of amity was not to be rejected. The counsell of Clytan was mean and indifferent between both, and therefore accepted to wir, that they thould addresse the Emhastadors to the King, to intreat him that he would permit them to take a day of deliberation upon a matter of fuch cools. quence in a full Diet of the Acernaniaus. In this Emballage Mnefilechas, and thole of his faction were employed of fet purpole: who having dispatched messengers covertly to King, to advertile him to approach the town with his forces, trifled out the time themselves, and madeno hast to set forward in their embassie. Whereupon these Embassadors were scarcely gone forthos the City, when Antiochus, was entred the borders, and soon the wed himlest hard at the gares, M And whiles they that wift nothing of this treaton were affeighted, and in great trouble and turmoil, called the youth baltily to arm, he was by Clysus and Mnefilsebus let into the City. Some willingly of themselves came running about the King , those also that were of the adverlagan. for very fear joyned with him. Whom he feeing to be afraid and terrified, he entertoined with gracious words, and so gently handled them, that in hope of his clemency so much divided and spoken of abroad certain States of Acarnania revolted and turned unto him. Then from Medie he went to Tyrrheam, unto which place he had fent Muefilechus and his Embassadors aforehand, But the treachery and deceit at Medio being discovered, made the Tyrrheans more wary and carefull then otherwise fearfull, who made him this plain direct answer without any double ambiguity, that they would admit of no new alliance, without the advice and authority of the Ro- N man Generals fo they that their gates, and disposed armed men upon their wals. Now it fell out very fitly and happily for confirming and encouraging the hearts of the Acarpanians, that Co. Offaving lent by Quintins, having received a garrifoo and fome few thips of A. Pofthamins, who by Actilius the Leiutenant had been appointed Governour of Cephalenia, was come to Lancas, and and much comforted the Allies, and put them in good hope, who also gave them to understand, that M. Acilim the Conful had already paffed the feas with his legions, and the Romans were encampedin The flat. And for as much as this bruit carried a great likelihood of truth, by reason that the teason of the year ferved now for navigation, the King after he had planted a garation as Medie and in other towns of Acamania, departed from Tyrrbenm, and passing through the Cities. of Atolia and Phecis, returned to Chalcis, Much about the time M. Baviss and King Philip, who had communed and dexiled togs-

ther before (during the winter) in the Daffarctions country, having fent Appins Claudinainte. Theffaly, for to raile the fiege before Lariffat and because the season then was unmeet and too. foon for execution of any exploit, were retired to their wintring herbours, now in the beginning of the Spring joyned all their forces together and came down into Theffely. (Now at the time was Antiechus in Acarnenia.) And at their first coming. Philip began to lay fiegenme A Mailean and Barbias to Phacison: which when he haddorced in manner at the first affault he wan Phofine also with like expedition From whence having retired handle to day as he took Corner reas and to confequently imprifed Excitant, and after he had planted gathlons in these towns that tion and to contenue in panet, are men, and ance in the panet of an arrival in the had thus recovered, he joyned with Philip again lying in negebolice. Mailea. Upon the very coming of the Roman army, when the complines had yielded themselves either for rear of forces. or for hope of pardon, they marched joyntly together with one army to recover thois towns whereof the Athamans were leized to wit, Aginiam, Ericinium, Gamphi, Silana, Tricea, Meli-Wilerco, total Phaloria: After this, they invelled Pedincum, where Philipthe Megapolitan lay ingariafor with five hundred foot, and forty horse; but before they gave the assault, they sent a transper to Philip to give him warning, that he should not adventure to try the utmost hazard. Bushe returned this answer again right flourly unto them, that he would be content to commit himlely to the Romans or the Theffalians, he passed not whether, but put his life and estate into the hands of King Philip he never would. Now when it appeared that they were to proceed by force, and for that it feemed that Limnea also at the same time might be assaulted, it was thought expedient that the King should go to Limman, and Babius staid still to batter and forcethe town of Pel-

It fortuned at the same time that M. Acilius the Col. having passed the seas with a power of 10000 foot, and 2000 horfe, and fifteen Elephants, commanded certain cholen Colonels of footmen to conduct all the Infantry to Lariffa, whiles himself with the Cavalry cameto King Philip. men to conduct an one amount year against when smaller when the Cavary came to ring raup before Limnes, At the coming of the Conful the town was yielded incontinently: the Kings gar-C rifon was delivered, and the Athamanians withall. Then the Conful went from Limnas to Pellinam, where the Athamans yielded first and afterwards Philip also the Megapolitan rendred himfelf. And as he came down from the fort, Philip the King chanced to meet with him, and in storn and derifion commanded his men to falure him with the file of King, and himfelf also by way of mockage came close unto him, and greeting him by the name of brother Philips (coffing and jemockage came crose unto ministra greening and all Majerty. Then was he brought before the Cof. and put in ward, and not long after fent bound to Rome, All the multirude befides of the Athamanians, as also of King Antischus his souldiers, which were within the garrisons of those rowns that were furrendred about that time were delivered unto Philip, who amounted to the number of 3000. The Conful departed to Lariffa to confult and take advice for the generall course of the D whole war. And in his way there met him Embassadors from Pieria and Metrapolis, for to render their Cities. Philip having courteoully and lovingly intreated above all other the prisoners of the Athamanians, that by their means he might win the grace and favour of that nation, and conceived some hope to conquer Athamania, led his army thirder, and lent his captives aforchand into their leverall Cities. Now they were of great account and reputation among their countrimen. and withall made report of the King his clemency coward them, and how liberally and bountifully befides he fied them: And Aminander, verily, who fe presence and majerty had kept tome of them in allegeance, fearing left he should be delivered into the hands of Philip, (who long time had been his mortall enemy;) and unto the Romans, whom he knew to have just cause at that time to be offended with him for his revolt, departed out of his own Realm with his wife and chil-E dren, and retited himself to Ambracia, Thus all Athamania became subject to King Philip, and at

The Conful fojourned certain daies at Laviffa, especially for to refresh his healts, which first had been fea-fick, and afterwards were tired with long travel; and thus when he had renewed, as it were, and repaired his army with a little rest and repose, he marched to Crata. At his coming thicher, thele towns, to wit, Pharfalus, Scotuff a, and Phere, together with King Antiochy, his garrious that lay there, were yielded up unto him. And having gut unto their choice, either to be some or carry full with him: as many of them as he faw willing (and thole were about a thousand) be delivered anto King Philp: the reft he (an back difarmed to Demenia. Then he regained Promising the fortrefles and piles there about it. Then began he to conduct forward his army toward the gulph of Meles: and when he approached the firstens, upon which the town Theusses is fitted, all the flower of the youth in their atmost quit the City, and put themselves in ambuth about the woods and passages, and from the higher ground charged upon the Romans in their march. The Conful at the fifth lent certain upto them to part near at hand with them and to tee if they could have them from fuch desperate oursage; but perceiving that they pertitled full as they begin he commanded a Colonel with two entigns of foundates to terch a compass about. in min fort, that he got between those armed men and rise town, and kept them from entrance; whereby he possessed in the City, being void of desendants. They they that lay in the for-rell in ambuth, he aring an outerly behind their backs of the rown taken, shed backward out of all parts of the wood, and fell upon the sword. fear that his cold flackness might not overthrow that quite, which his rash folly had beeun and t enterprised, he sent out his courriers into Acolia, to give them warning to levy all their youth and assemble them together; and himself for his dwiffight had brought thither almost 10000 footmen, who were made up full and furnished by them that after came out of Afia, and 500 horsemen besides. To this place perceiving that there repaired smaller numbers by many degrees thanever at any time before, and that they were but the Nobles only and some sew of their valfalls, who protested that they had done their endeavor to levy out of their Cities as many as posfibly they could: but neither by authority, nor for love and favour, nor yet with absolute command were they able to prevail or do any good with them that refused warfare:) and seeing himfelf thus forfaken on all fides, as well of his own subjects who dragged behind in Afia, as of his allies who performed not those matters, in the hope whereof they had called him to allift them, I he withdrew himself within the straights of Thermopyle. of the Appennine. On the fore part of this straight and forrest of Thermopylatoward the North lyeth Epirus and Perrhabia, Magnefia and Theffaly, also the Phthiotæ of Achan, and the gulph Malea: but more fouthward is discovered the greatest part of Etolia and Acarnania, Phocis, Loeris and Baotia, together with the Island Euban joyning close thereto: behind it is situate the country of Attica running into the fea like a promontory, and befides it Peloponne fue. This mountain taking his beginning at Lencas and the Ponant or Western sea, reacheth through Etoliato the Levant or Easterly Ocean, and is so full of rocks and rough crags betwen, that no wholearmies, no, nor so much as single travellers lightly appointed, can find but hardly and with much ado w the waies and paths to pais through the utmost brows and the hils of this mountain bending toward the east, they call Oesa; and the highest pitch and knop thereof, is called Callidromos; at the foor whereof lyeth the valley leading toward the gulph of Malea, wherein the plain is not above threescore paces broad. And this is the only high and port-way by which an army may march, if it be not otherwise empeached. And hereupon it is, that the passage is called * Pyla: and of some (because there are found therein certain natural hot waters or bains) Thermopila: even that very place which is so famous and renowned for the memorable death of the Laced monians more than for any worthy battell against the Persians, Here lay encamped Antiochus at this present (carrying nothing that mind nor resolution as those Lacedamonians did) within the gates as it were of the ftraights, where he enclosed and stopped the passage besides, with strong desences: And L when he had caft a double rampire and trench, yea, and raifed a mure and wall where need was (which to do the place afforded him great plenty offtone lying every where) and had made all fure: prefuming confidently that the Roman army would never venture nor be able to break through those barricadoes that way : he sent of those 4000 Ætolians (for so many were met together) some to keep a garrison in Heraclea, situate even before the very gullet and streight; and others to Hipata: for that he made no doubt but the Conful would affail Heracles, and many

polts brought word, that all about Hypata was already wasted. Now the Conful having spoiled the territory of Hypata first, and then of Heraclea, (wherethe Ætolians aids did no good and served to no purpose in the one place or the other) pitched his camp over-against the King, even in the very mouth of the gullet, near the sountains of the hot M waters aforelaid: both those regiments above-named of the Ætolians were got within the town Heraclea, and there kept themselves sure. Antiochus, who before he saw his enemies, thought all was fast enough and sufficiently fenced, began then to fear lest the Roman souldiers would find out some privy paths and waies, thereby they might pass and get over those high hils that commanded his camp: for a rumour ran, that the Lacedamonians in times past were so enclosed by the Perfians, and of late daies also King Philip was likewise compassed and environed by these very fame Romans. Whereupon he dispatched a messenger to the Ætolians in Heracles, willing them to do him thus much service yet in these his wars, as to seize the tops of those hils and to keep them that the Romans might have no passage that way. Upon this message received, there arofe fome differition among the Ætolians. Some were of mind to obey the King his will and N commandment, and to go accordingly; but others thought better to tarry fill at Heraclea, to attend upon fortune and lee what would happen: to the end, that if the King should chance to be vanquished by the Conful, they might have in readiness their forces fresh and in heart, to succour and aid their own Cities near at hand; or if his luck were to defeat the Conful, then they might follow the Romans in chase, when they were disbanded and scattered asunder. Both parts, thus divided as they were; not only perfifted fill in their feverall designments, but also put the same in execution by the mielves. For two thouland of them remained at Heraclea; the other two thonfand parted themselves three waies, namely, to Callidromos, to Rhoduntia. and Tichius, (thefe are the names of three principall high hills;) and each company took and held one. The Conful when he saw that the Etolians were possessed of these higher places, sent M. Porcius Cato and O L. Valerius Flaceus, two of his Lieutenants (who both had been Confuls) with two thousand chosen men against these holds of the Etolians, to wit, Flacens against Rhoduntia and Tichinis, and Caro against Callidromos: himself before that he advanced his battell against his enemies, made a brief speech unto his souldiers in this manner : "My souldiers, I see that the most part " of you even of every quality and degree, are they that in this very Province sometime served "under the conduct, charge, and government of T. Quimins in the Macedonian war. The straights

"of that passage then, near the river Aout, were far more difficult to gain and get over than this "in; forbere are very gates, year, and one naturall way (as it wete.) to pals through, as if allelfe "were stopped up between two feas. There were more thronger delences and sconces against them "at that time, and shorte planted in places more convenient and commodious. The army of the enemies then, was both for number greater & for men& fouldiers much better ; for therein were the Macedonians, the Thracians, and the Illyrians, all most fierce and warlike nations in this are " Syrians and Afiatick Greeks, or half Ahans, the vainett kind of people of all others, and bern to se ferve. The Kingthere, namely Philip a most noble warrior exercised and inured ever from his "vouth in the neighbour-wars of the Thracians and Illyrians, & all the nations bordering upon "him: but this Ansiashue (to lay nothing of all his life befides) is he, who being come out of Alla B" into Europe, forto make war upon the people of Rome, both done all the long wintertime nosthing more memorable than this. That for to please his wanton lust he hath taken to wife the " daughter of a privat perion; a man(I fay) of low degree and base quality among other Citizens: " & this new married manifed fat and franked (as I may fo fay) with dainty suppers & delicat bride-* bankets, is come forth (for footh) to fight a battell. His whole ftrength and all his hope hath been in the Arolians, a people of all others most vain, unconstant, and unthankfull, as ye have tried et heretofore, and Antiochus findeth true at this present, For neither assembled they in great num-"ber nor possible was it to keep them together in the camp: may, which more is they mutine a-" mong themselves, and having demanded and required the guard of Hypata and Heraelea, they a have defended neither the one nor the other. Some of them are fled to the tops of the moun-C " tains : others have thut themselves within Heraclea. The King himself hath consessed plainly, " that he was never so hardy as to meet in plain field and affront the enemy, no, nor so much as to " pitch his camp in open ground; in that abandoning all that country before him, which he vaun-"ted and bragged that he had taken from us and Philip, he hath hidden himself among the rocks. "He hath not encamped before the entrance of the gullet and straights (as the same goeth of the "Lacedamonians in times past) but pitched his tents far within. But neither shall those narrow straights save him no more than those "fleep hills defend the Ætolians, which they have seized. This one thing hath been so recast and "provided for on all fides, that ye shall have nothing to make head against, but your enemies, D" Now must ye resolve upon this point, That ye fight not only for the liberty of Groove (and "yet even this also were a brave and honourable title, to be faid for to deliver the same now out "of the hands of Antiochin and the Etolians, which before you freed from King Philip) nor. "that ye shall have no other reward and recompence for your pains; but that which we shall find now in the Kings camp, but also that the great provision and surniture which daily is expected seftom Ephefus, shall be your prize and booty, and that ye shall hereafter make a way for the Ro-" man Empire into Asia, Syria, and all those most wealthy and rich Realms, even as far as to the "Levantiun. And what shall let us then, but that from Gades to the red sea we bound and limit " our State and Dominion, even with the very Ocean that environeth and compaffeth the round "globe of the earth? Prepare your hearts there-"fore and conrages answerable to fo high rewards, that with the leave and help of the gods we "may to morrow fight a field, After this speech the assembly brake up, and the souldiers being dismissed, made ready their armor and weapons, before they took repast or repose. And in the mi orning, by dawning of the day, the Conful put out the figuall of battell, and let his army in array, with a narrow and pointed front, according to the nature and fir aightness of the place. The King seeing the entigns of his enemies, led forth his forces like wife. Part of his light armours the planzed before the rampier and trench in the forefront, then he placed the flower and flyength of the Macedonians, whom they call Sariffophori, i.e. Pikemen, for the furety and lafeguard of his delences and forufications. And to flank these on the left side, he put the archers, the flingers of warts, F and flingers of flours, hard upon the foot of the hill, that from the higher ground they might affail and pelt the naked fides of the eriemies. On the right flank of these Maredonians, at the very edge and point of the mones and defences, which as they were enclosed and mounded with those places which reach to the fea, and are unpassable by reason of the bogs, muddy marshes; quagmires; and quicklands, he fet the Elephants with their ordinary and usuall guard. After them his hor emen and mem of atms. Then leaving an indifferent space between, he ranged the rest of his forces in the fecond ward or middle battaillon. The Macedonians who were believed before the campand the trenchar the first sustained the Romans easily enough (who assaid on every side to make an emry) for much help they had of them, who from the upper ground weighed bullets one of their flings, as thick as an hail florm, who lanched darts allo, and thot arrows besides. But 'G when safterwards greater numbers of enemies preffed upon them, and charged them with such violence as possibly might not be endured, they gave ground, and retired within their fortifications, lacepang yet their array and their ranks whole. And then from the rampier they made (asit were lanother pallifado with their long pikes that they held out afore them. Now the height of sheir camp, mure was so reasonable, that as it afforded some rise and vantage of ground for their ownmente fighe upon it, fo by reason of the length of their spears, they might reach the enemy under them, Informed as many of the Romans approaching rathly, and venturing to clamber up, were run clean through and either they had given over and done nothing, or elfe more of them M had died for it, but that M. Porciss Caro having beaten from the top of Callidronius the Etolians, and flain a great part of them (for he surprised them suddenly at unawares, and wost of them fast asleep) appeared upon the hill that commandeth the camp, Flacem sped not so well at Tibhius and Rhodiuntia, who laboured to get up those cliffs and holds, but to no puspose. The Maredo nians and the rest that were in the Kings host and camp, at first, when they descried afar off nothing but a multitude and number marching, imagined verily, that they were the Ætolians, who having discovered the battell and fight a good way off were coming to aid them. But so so so they beheld and discerned near at hand the entignes and armour of the Romans, they took themselves in their own errour; and were upon a sudden strucken with such sear, that they all slung their weapons away, and fled. But both their fortifications and defences in the way, & allo the narrow-1 ness of the vale through which they were to be pursued, handred the Romans in following the thate. And the Elephants above all which were in the rereward took up the ground fo, as that the footnen could hardly pass by them, and the horiemen by no means possible; so affrighted were the horses, and caused more trouble and disorder among themselves, than they did during the battell. Besides the Romans staid sometime behind, whiles they risled and ransacked the camp. Howbeit they had the enemy in chale that day as far as Lylaum, killing and taking in the very way, not only many horses and men, but also slaying the Elephants which they could not take alive : which done they returned to their own camp, which that day had been affailed by the Ætolians. cious, fo it took no effect at all. The Conful having at the reliefe of the third watch the night K ensuing, sent before his Cavalry to pursue the enemy, advanced likewise the enigns of his legions forward by break of day. The King by this time had won some ground, and got a good way before; for he never gave over galloping with bridle in horse neck, untill he had recovered Elatia. Where first he gathered together the broken ends of his army thus dispersed in flight, and so having rallied a small and poor troop of souldiers, and the same armed by the halls, he retired to Chalcis. The Roman Cavalry was not able to overtake the King himself at Elatia, but overthrew and cut off a great part of his army, which either for wearineis rested themselves dragging behind or elie were feattered one from the other, as milling their way in those unknown quarters. going as they did without their guids: and letting aside five hundred which kept about the King, there was not one thatescaped of the whole army. Which was but a small number in proportion L of 10000 (if they were no more) for so many (according to Polybius) we have written that the King conducted over with him for his partition Greece. What were they then to that great power, which (if webeleeve Valerius Antias) came with the King for he writeth that he had in his hoft threescore thousand, and that forty thousand were slain of them, and above five thousand taken prisoners, with the loss of military enfigus two hundred and thirty. Of Romans there died in all a hundred and fifty. As the Conful marched with his army through Phocis and Buotia, the States and Cities which were privy to the revolt, and partly culpable, flood without their gates with their infules and veils in token of peace, and craved mer, y, learing they should have been pilled and ransacked as enemies. But his hoft journeyed every day as in a peaceable and friend-country, doing no hurtor M wrong to any earthly creature, until they were come into the territory of Corona : where the Statue or Image of Antiochus erected in the Temple of Minerva lionea kindled theircholer, and the fouldiers were permitted to spoil the country lying about that Temple, But bethinking themselves that (confidering the faid Statue was fet up with the publike content of all Beatia) it was an indignity to deal fo hardly with that territory only of Corona, the fouldiers were immediatly called in and reclaimed, and to they ceased the wasting and spoiling thereof. The Bootians only had a check and rebuke by words for carrying so unthankfull hearts to the Romans, of whom they had so lately received fuch high favours and benefits.

At the very time of the battell aforefaid, there rode at anthor ten ships of the Kings, in the gulph of Maleanear to Thronium under the charge and conduct of Ifidorus, To which place Mer N ander the Acamanian, being fled from the conflict, fresh bleeding and full of grievous wounds, brought news of the unfortunat fight, Wherupon the thips in great fear for this late terrous, made hafte and away to Ceneum in Eubaa, where Alexander died, and was interred. But three other thips which were come out of Afia, and lay in the tame rode, upon the news of the defeat of the army returned to Ephefus And Ifidorus croffed the leas from Ceneum to Demetrias, if peradventure the King were fled thither. About that very time, A. Astilius the Admiral of the Romannavy intercepted and surprised greatstore of the Kings provisions, which had passed already thestraights near the Island Andres. Some ships hefenk, others he boorded and took: as for those that came hindmost in the rereward, they turned fail, and shaped their course into Asia, Attilius being returned to Pyrasum (from whence he came) with a fleet of ships taken from the enemies, divided great o ftore of corn both among the Athenians, and other allies also of that country,

Antiochus somewhat before the Cornel his coming, loosed from Chalcis, and first fell with the Island Tenns, and afterwards failed to Ephefus. Against the Contul his arrivall at Chalcin the gates were fet open for him, and Aristotle the Captain there for the King, quit the place upon the approschment of the Conful. In like manner other Cities in Eubea yielded without refiftance. And to within few daies (when all troubles were appealed and fer in quiet order without the hurt and A damage of any one City) the army was brought back to The morple, and wan much more honour and commendation for the modelty used after victory that for the victory if self. From thence the Conful dispatched M. Carbio Rome, by whose certain and fine relation, the Senat and people might have full knowledge of all the affairs that had passed. Who taking the at nat and people imper Creafa (a post town of Merchandise flanding within the Hintoff sulph of Corine) arrived at Paire, a City in Aohas, From Paira, he coasted along the rivers of Etolia and Acamania, as far as Cora City in Account to 'Hydrantum in Italy,' from whence he travelled by land, and in exceeding or transi great hastewithin five daies came to Rome. Early in the morning before day light he entred the City, and from the gate rode directly to M. Junius the Prator, who affembled the Senar berlines by the break of day: and thither, L. Cornelius Scipio (who fome daies before had been difmiffed B. and feat away from the camp by the Conful) hearing at his fift coming that Cato was got before him, and in the Senat, repaired, even as he was relating the news: Then these two Lieutenants by the commandment of the Senat were presented in the generall affembly of the people where they declared the same which they had done before in the Senat house, as touching the deeds atchieved in Etolia. And ordained it was that a folemn procession for three daies should be holden, and that the Prator should sacrifice forty head of greater beafts, in the honour of what gods he

And at the same time M. Fulvius Nobilior, who two yers before went as Prator into the farther Spain, entred the City in pomp of an Ovation, or perty triumph. He canled to be born before him of filver bigats 130000. And befides that, filver in coin and ready money, 12000 pound C weight, Alfo in gold the weight of 127 pound. Acidius the Conful ient certain meffengers from Thermopple to the Etolians at Heracles, to advertise them that before he came they would now at laft be wifer, and bethink themselves (after such experience of the King his vanity and insufficiency) for to deliver up Heraclea, and crave pardon of the Senar, either for their wilfull folly, or their blind errour. Who used these and such like motives and inducements unto them, namely, That other Cities likewise of Greece (during this war) abandoned the Romans and revolted from them, at whose hands they had received so many benefits: yet because that after the King was fled (upon whose affurance they had difloyally broken their allegeance) they flood not out fill, not perifited obdinately in their fault and folly; were received to mercy and protection. The Attolians likewise albeit they followed not the King, but sent for him, and were rather conducters and D leaders; than companions and affociats in this war, yet if they could take up in time and repent, they might be pardoned and laved. But no answer returned they tending to peace: nay, it appeafed, that the matter would come to a triall by arms, and for all the King was vanquished, yet the Acolian war was behind as wholly and entire as before time! Wherenpon the Conful diflodged from Thermopyla, and marched directly against Heraclea: yes, and the very same day he rode on horseback all about the walls to view the fituation of the City. This Herackea's seated at the foot of the mountain Oesa: & though the town it self stander bin a plain, yet a fortress it hath built up? on an high ground, which as it overlooketh the City, fo it is forteep on every fide; that it is altogether inaccessible. After he had diligently beheld all things that were to be marked and known;

genter maccomplexance he man ungeren places at once. "Interest Valerius he gave in charge to he determined to affant the town in four places at once." Interest Valerius he gave in charge to be planthis platforms and to batter that fide where the river Affant sinneth, and where the publike place of exercise is built. T. Sempronius Long us had commission to assail the Castle, without the wallsindeed; but yet better inhabited and more peopled (#salman would fry) iffen the townit felfiOn that fide which standeth toward the gulph of Miles, which part yieldelf the hardest accelsibe appointed M. Babina And from another prety river which they call " Melai, he fet Appins "Black water Chading appointed on the Temple of Diana! Through the great industry and carried labour of their following, thriving who could perform the best service, the work went to well forward, that within few daies the frames and platforms, the Rams and all other engine of battery meet for the affault of Cities were finished. For beildes that the terefrory about Heradea, being a mostypetund and full of talltrees, afforded them plenty enough of timber to frame and per form all forts of fabricks: the houses also in the entry of the Only without full the other in and any old, the content of the only without full the other in the content of the other in aor only ported beams, joyths, planks, and boords, bur brick, and the planer, morret, and none of all fizes for divers and fundry vies. So, the Romans affahlted the town rather with fabricks, ordnance, and artillery, thin by force of unis ? but the Acolians contrariwile defended themfelves by main Riength and their weapons. For when as the walls thould be shaken with the Ransporther caught noe hold of them as the manner is with cords, and by plucking them afide, availed their force; but armed in great number they carried fire with they to fling upon the terraces and should bricks. They had bendes divers values and arches in the walls at which they could reading and their fally out; and ever as themicives cloted up the breaches of their walls, or made of the reading and ever as themicives cloted up the breaches of their walls, or made of the reading of at once they aright break forth upon their enemies. Thus for the first dates, whiles they were fresh in heart, they issued forth of centimes and many together, and quir themselves right lustly: bue afterwards fewer numbers, and more flackly every day than other. For being evermore employed about many things at order, nothing to much tamed and wearled then, as watching. For whereas the Romans had a great number of londdiers, and one guarded after another fuccessively by turns; the Redlins being fo few, were confirmined without any change to continue in unceffant labour night and day. Thus for the space of twenty sour daies they had no see nontained in H day and night was all one unto them, maintaining fight fill, and labouring without intermitten against the enemies that affailed the City in all four quarters at once, When the Consultanemonce again the Excilians were wearied and overtoiled (partly by counting the time, and partly by the which be had learned of certain fugitives) he used this policy and stratagem. About midnight he founded the retreat, and having drawn all his fouldiers at once from the affault, held them onles in the camp untill the third hour of the day. After that, he began to give a fresh charge, and continued it upto midnight following, and so gave over again untill the same hour before nonn. The Exolians supposing verily that the cause why they surceased the assault, was for very wearings (like as themielves were tired out) fo foon as the Romans had the retreat founded unto them departed every man from his ward and quarter, as if they also by the same signall were called away. I and shewed not themselves in armor upon the walls before the third hour of the next day. The Three of the Conful having at one time given over the battery aforesaid at midnight, began at the fourth watch a fresh assault again with all forcible means in three parts: and at one side, he gave commandment to T. Sempronius to keep his men together, and intentively to observe and wait for the fignall: affuring himself that in the alarm by night, the enemies would run to those places from whence they heard the noise. The Acolians, many of them being found afleep, had much to do to rouse themselves, and were loath to rise up from their sweet sleep, their bodies being so weary with toiling moiling, and watching before, Some of them who were yet awake ran in the dark to the place where the affailants made a noise. Their enemies laboured to get into the town some by mounting over the ruins and breaches of the broken wall, others by scaling and climbing with ladders. And against them the Ætolians ran from all parts, ready to succour and help. One quarter, whereas there flood houles without the City, was neither defended nor affailed: but as there were fome ready and waited for the figual to give the assault, so there was not one of the other part for to refift and defend. Now began the day to peep, when as the Conful put forth the figual, and the fouldiers began to mount over into the City, and found none to withfrand them: fome entred at the walshalfbroken down, others scaled them with ladders where they flood whole and sound. And the cry was not so soon heard that the City was taken, but the Ætolians left their guardson all fides, and fled into the Cafile. The fonldiers that had won the town were permitted by the Cof to rifle and ranfack it: which was not done fo much upon anger and defpite, as in this regard that the jouldiers who had been kept thort & falling thus long (notwich landing to many towns L recovered out of the enemies hands) might once at length in longe one place take the fruit of vie Grory. The Cof, having called from thence about noon, the fouldiers unto him, divided them into two parts, whereof he commanded the one to cast about the foot of the hils unto a rock or cliff, which being in height equal to the Callle aforesaid, was not withstanding divided from it by a valley between, feeming as if it had been sometime a part thereof and cut from it. Now these two points of the hils shot up so near together in the head, that from the top of the one, a man might lance a dart into the Calife or fortrels. The Cof. with the other half of the fouldiers flaid beneath, expecting a fign and token from them that were to get up the cliff behind, ready thereupon to mount up from the town fide into the fort. The Atolians that were within the Calla could be ther abide at the first the shout of those that had seized the cliff, nor afterwards the affault of the M Romans from the City, both for that their hearts failed them and were danted alterdy, and also because they were unprovided of all necessaries for to endure any long siege and affault; considering that women and children and allthe other impotent mulattude anmeet to bear arms, were got thither in to great numbers, that the place was hardly able to seceive and contain much left to keep and maintain them : and therefore at the first assault, they cast down their weapons and vielded Among other principal personages of the Etolians, Damocritas also was delivered the, who in the beginning of the war when T. Quinting defired to fee a copy of the Decree of the Exolians for the lending for Antiochus, answered, Thar he would frew it him in lealy, when the disolians > that they had got him into their hands. During the time that the Romans affailed Hiracles, Philip also befieged and hastered Land according as it was before agreed between them: for near unto Thermopyla, at what time as the Cof returned out of Baotia, he met with him, rof purpose to fignific his joy inthe behalf of him and the people of Rome, for their archieved vactory; and allow excuse himself by escation of licknels, that he was not prefent with him in perform the managing of the wars. From thence they parted afunder, and took divers water, for to affault these two Cities (as I said) both as ence ware diffant they were one from the other near seven miles. And forasmuch as Lamia was seased upon an hill therefore the town discovered and overlooked all the country about but especially on that fide toward Heracles, where, by ressonthat it femeth a less compas, it reprefentetha full pror fpect to the eye. When as the Romans and Magedonians labouring and fitting who could to obetter, were day, and night emploied either about their fabricke and pioners worker elso in skirmith and fight the Macedoniaus found more difficulty than they, in this respect, that the Romans were bused in platforms, mantless, and works all above grounds but the Macedoniaus week purto undermine: and oftensimes (as it falleth out in such fromy and craggy ground) they make with hard flints and rags not minable; and fuch as no iron or fleel-tool was able to touch and pierce. The King seeing little good done by this means, and his enterprise going but flowly for ward, began to found the townsmen, and so compathem to render the City, ming the mediation therein of their Chief Chiesens whom he parled withall sor this reckoning he made, that if Hereclea were forced before it, they within the City would tooner yield unto the Romans chanto him, and to the Could should win all the abank to himself for levying the fiege. And nothing was he thort of his count; for immediatly apon the winning of Heracles, a medienger came unto him from the Conful, willing him to forcease the assault and the fiege; alledging, it was more reason. that the Roman fouldiers who had fought in tanged battell with the Etolians, should have the reward and recompense of the victory. By this means Lamia was abandoned, and by theruin of Heracles her neighbour City avoided and escaped the like calamity of her own.

Some few daigs before that Heracles was won, the Etolians having affembled a Dier at Hypa-B ta, addressed Emballadors unto Antiochus, and Thoss among the rest, even he, who aforetime had been lent unto him, His commission and charge was, first, To request the King that once again he would rally his forces as well by land as at fea, and in person pais over into Greece: secondly, If any other important affairs hindred him, yet that he would fend unto them both men and money. For as it touched his Highness, in honour, sepuration, and credit, not to see his allies abandoned; so it made for the lafegard and security of his own Realm and royall estate, not to suffer the Romans (after they had oncedefeated the Atolians) to fail over into Afia at their eafe and pleasure, with all their forces. These were no tained devices, but true remonstrances indeed; and therefore prevailed the more with the King. Whereupon he delivered money prefently to the Embassadors, sufficient to defray the charges of the war, and promised certainly to send mento C ferre both by land and fea. Those alone of all the Embassadors he kept still with him, who was not himself unwilling to flay behind, because he might be ever at hand to call upon the King for to perform his word and behelt. But the winning of Heracles killed the heats clean of the Etolians in the end: and within few daies after that they had dispatched their Embassadors into Afig., about the renewing of the war and fending for the King, they laid apart all defignments of arms, and addressed their Orators unto the Romans to crave peace. Who, as they began to make some speech, the Consul cut them off, and said, he had other matters of greater importance to think upon and to dispatch; and commanded them to content themselves with a truce for ten daies, and to return to Hypata; and with them he fent L. Valerius Flacess, unto whom they should declare those things that they were about to deliver unto him, and whatsoever else they D had to lay, When they were arrived at Hypata, the chief and principall Acolians affembled themlelyes in the lodging of Elucans, confuling with him what course they were to take in their treaty, with the Conful. And when they went in hand to alledge the ancient rights of the leagues, and to lay, abroad their good demerits, and what they had done for the Romans: " Flass w bad ethem, lay a firaw there, and speak no more of the priviledge of those covenants and accords which they themselves had broken; shewing unto them, that they should speed better and gain more by a simple consession of their respain, and in recourse only to prayer and humble supplication; for assume as all the hope they might have of fafety, rested not in their own defert and goodness of their canse, but in the meer clemency and mercy of the people of Rome; epromiting for his part to affift them, and second their pesitions as well no the Conful as the Seant of flowelince that thicher also they must of necessity send an Embassisge. This way seemed to them all, the best simply for their salety, namely, to put themselves to the disposition and devo-tion of the Romans: for they supposed by this means to drive the Romans for very shame to have regard of them & not to offer hurt or violent outrage to them, coming in the habit of poor impliants; and yet withdlist any opportunity of better fortune should in the mean time offer it fellunts them for bestses own Masses severtheles and at their choice. When they were come beings the Col. Planess the chief of that embaffie, mades long Oration, couching and framing his words funder water tight artificially. So mitigate, and affwage the wrath of the conqueror; which he suppressed spaceholded with this speech, saying, That the Etolians committed them cives and all that they had to the ment; and prosection of the people of Rome. When the Cof. heard thele words : Seeyou do fo then indeed (qd he) Q ye Atolians, and aske heed I advise you that you deal herein some field. Then the stout courage both of

Phanest and the reft of the Etolians, was well cooled & shated and to at length they faw in what H poor plight they were, And Phaneas made answers her both himself and the Etolians there pretent in place, knew well, that those things were to be performed which were imposed upon thembut (quoth he) there needs a Councill of the Etolians for to enact a decree thereof, and therefore he requested the Consulto allow a surcease of arms only for ten daies. Then Flacen began to fpeak for the Ætolians, and at his request the faid abstinence was granted, and so they returned to Hypata, When Phaneas had related in the privy Councill of those elect peers of that nation called Appeleti, as well the demands that were commanded, as what had like to have falm upon them'elves in perion, the peers fighed deeply and groaned again, to fee their miferable condition; howbeit they were all of opinion, that the victor must of necessity be obeyed and a generall Parliament affembled of the Ætolian Burgesses out of all their towns and Cities. When I all that multitude wasgathered together, and heard the same related again, their hearts so fretted within them at the cruelty and indignity of those Lordly commands, that if they had been well fested in peace, yet such a fit of anger had been enough to have put them into arms. And to flir the tume and choler the more, the difficulty of effecting the things demanded, helped well: for how possibly could they compass to deliver Aminander, being as he was an absolute King? But even then there was prelented unto them by chance a new hope, For Nicander at that very time, coming from King Antiochus, filled the peoples heads with this vain expectation. namely, that the King made wondrous provision for war, as well by sea as land. This Nicander having accomplished his Embassage, and made return again into Letolia, within the compass of twelve daies, after he was embarked, arrived at Phalera in the gulph of Malea: from whence w having brought the monies which he had, down to Lamia, whiles himfelf with certain nimble men and light appointed, travelled toward Hypata in the evening, between the Roman and Atolian camp, through paths that he well knew; he chanced to flumble, ere he was aware, upon the corps de quard of the Macedonians, and was brought to the King before supper was done, the table taken up, and the King rifen. When Philip was advertised thereof, he shewed no other countenance, than it a friend or guest, and not an enemy was come; he bad him fit down at the board, and eat his meat. Afterwards he kept him there with him still in the room, and voided all the reft, willing him in no case to be afraid, "He blamed greatly the bad courses and delign-" ments of the Ætolians (which evermore lighted upon their own pares) who first had brought "the Romans and then Antiochus into Greece, But for my part (quoth he) fince things done and L " paft, may fooner be blamed than amended, I am content to forget and put all under my foot, "and will never be the man that will feem to infult over them in their diffress and advertity. "And to should the Ætolians likewise take up in time, and lay aside all their rancor and malice " to me and Nicander especially ought to remember this day, on which by me his life waspre-"ferved. With that he fent him away with a good convoy, untill he was past all danger; and this Nicander, as is beforefaid came to Hypara, even as the Atolians were in deep confultation about

This steps he found as toiltome and painful, as that at Heraeles.

At the same time began the Acharans to lay siege to Ma spore Ho in Pelaponia six, for that it resused to be of their Commill and association. For these two Cities, Mayind and Elia, where exempt from the Acharan Diet and accorded with the Echaras. However, the Blans, after that Intiochis was chaled out of Greece, give the Embattadors of Achara more mild ansign, it wit. Unto whom after he had shewed the causes of the siege, he received at his hands a gentle rebuse only, for that he had enterprised a matter of so great consequence without his authority; with an express commandment also to cass and discharge his army, and not to disturb and trouble the peace, made for the good and benefit of all. The Messenians likewise he charged to call home their banished persons into their City, and to joyn with the Acharans in their generall Diet and Assembly. And if they either had any matters to refuse, or would willingly provide for themselves against the structure time, he willed them to make their repair unto him at Corimb, and enjoyned Diophanes immediatly to summon the Diet of the Acharans for him, when B personally himself would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the Island Zacymbus.

B personally himself would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the siland Zacynthus, that by stand and treachery they had come by and kept, he required that it should be refored to the Romans. Now this sile had sometime appertained to Philip the King of the Macedonians, and he gave it unto Aminander, in consideration, that he might conduct his army into the higher er parts of Etalia, through Athannania: in which expeditions and exploits of his, the Resolant hearts were so abated and quaited, that they were constrained to seek peace. Aminander made first Philip the Megapolitan governour of this silands but afterwards, in time of that war wherein in martial affairs, and sent Hieroeles the Agrigentin to succeed him in his place. This Hieroeles, after the desert and slight of Anicolus from Thermoptle, and the expulsion of Anicolus, from Thermoptle, and the expulsion of Anicolus, some position of Sumander out of Cathannania by King Philip dispatched of his own motion certain messegers with Disphases the

At the same time, King Philip asked the Conful as he marched to Naupastum, Whether it was his pleasure, that he in the mean while should recover and regain those Cities which were revolted from the affociation of the Romans? And having a grant and warrant from him, he led his forces against Demetrias, knowing well enough in what terms of troubles that City then stood. For being forlorn and in otter despair, seeing Amiochushad for saken them and no hope at all remaining in the Atolians: they looked every day and night either for the coming of Philip their heavy friend; or elle even the Romans themselves a worse enemy, like as they had a more just cause of anger and indignation against them. A confused and disordered fort there were of King Antiochas his fouldiers, who being but a few as first less there to lie in garrison, grew after to be more and most of them unarmed; such as after the field was lost [at Thermopyle] thither chanced to fliesand neither had thrength nor heartenough to abide a frege. And therefore when Philip ient certain messengers before unto them, to figuide, that there was some hope that they might be pardoned: they made them this answers. Therethegates were open for the King; and that he might enter at his pleasure. At his first entrance, certain thief men of mark quit the City and departed, and Euritochus killed himself. The gastilon souldiers of Antiochus (for so they had capitulated) were conducted to Lysimachia through Macedon; and Thrace, accompanied with a con-G voy of Maredonians, for fear that any man should do them harm. There were some few ships allow the rode of Demetrias, under the command of Indarus, which together with their leader and Captain were difinified. After this, he regained Dolopia, Aperantia, and certain Cities of During the time that Philip was employed in these affairs, T. Quintius having recovered the Island Zagrathus, departed from the Dies of the Achange, and antitus having recovered the

Inand Zaspines, departed from the Diet of the Acheans, and croffed the leas to Naspatum, which had been beleasuered already two months, & was at the point to be forced and loss which

if it might have been won by affanle, it was thought that the whole nation and name of the Eto- A lians there would have perithed for ever. And albeit he had good caute to be highly effended and displeased wish the Etolians, incremembrance that they only checked and impeached his glory. at what time as he fet Greece free: and that they were nothing firred and moved with his authority, when he (forewarning them that tholerbings would happen which afterwards fell our just fo indeed) would have discounselled and scared them from soolish and surious designs : yet, supposing that it was a special part of his charge and work, that no nation of Greece (now freed by him Ishould utterly be subverted and destroyed, he began to walk up and down along under the walis to the end that he might be seen, and soon known of the Ætolians. And anon the very formost quaids took notice of him, & noted it was presently throughout all the ranks and companies that Quintius was there. And thereupon they ran from all parts up to the walls, every t man stretched forth his hards, and with one accord and consonant voice called by name unto Quinting, befeeching him to help and lave them. And albeit he was moved at these their pitions cries with commileration, yet for that time he fignified by the turning away of his head, that he refused and denied them : asking withall, What lay in him to do them any good? But afterwards. being come unto the Conful, "Know you not (quoth he) O M. Acilus whereabout we are and what we have in hand? or if you be a man provident enough, efteem you not that it mainly con-" cerneth the common-weal? He let the Conful by these words a longing, and caused him to give more attentive ear what he would say and withall, Why do you not speak forth (quoth the Conful) and utter your mind what the matter is? Then quoth Quintins: "See you not that after you " have vanquished Anticchus, you spend and lose much time here in the siege and assault of two w Cities, when as now the year of your government is wellnear come about? And Philip in the "mean time without seeing a battell or the entigns of his enemies displaied, hath gained and joy-"ned to himself not Cities only, but so many nations already, namely, Ashamania, Perrhubia, A-" perantia and Dolopia? But it is nothing to good and expedient for us, nor standeth it us to much "upon, to take down the Etolians and pare their nails, as to look unto Philip that he wax not "too great: and (feeing you and your fouldiers have not got yet two Cities in reward and re-"compence of victory) not to fuffer him to go clear away with fo many nations of Greece! The Conful accorded hereunto: but he thought it a shame and dishonour for him to give over the fiege and effect nothing: but afterwards, all the matter was put unto the disposition of Quintime, Who went again to that fide of the wall, whereas a little before the Ætolians called and I cried aloud unto him. And when as they intreated him more earnestly and with greater affective on to take party of the Atolian people, he willed some of them to come forth unto him. And immediatly, Phancachimselt with other principall persons of the Ætolians, went out unto him; unto whom bring proftrate and groveling at his feet: "Your present fortune (quoth he) and hard of effate wherein you are, caused me both to temper my choler and also to stay my tongue. Those things you now ice are faln out, which I foretold would come to pass. Howbeit, since it hath been allotted unto me as it were Siby defliny to be a foster-father (as I may so say) to nusse up Greece, I will not cease even to do won good, as thankleis and ungratefull persons as you are. Send your Orators to the Conful, M to intreat him to grant you atruce for to long, untill you may address your Embassadors to "Rome, by whom you shall wholly refer and submit your selves to the Senat: and I will norfail to be an interceffor and advocate to the Confut for you and likewife unto the Senat. And, as Quinting Counfelled them, fo did they, Neither rejected the Conful their Embaffie, but granted shom abilinence of war for such a term as within which they might have an answer of their Embiffige to Rome : fo he diflodged, the fiege was raifed, and the army fent into Phocis. The Conthe together with Quinting paffed over the fea to Agium, unto the generall Councill of Achea. There was much treaty and parly about the Eleans, and the restoring of the Lacedamonians exides; but nothing was effected in the one or the other. As for the Lacedamonians, the Achaans were defirous to referve that for themselves, and to win thereby a thank, as proceeding from N their speciall grace, And the Eleans, chose rather to come and be united to the Achaens Parlia ment of themselves, than by the mediation of the Romans. The Embassadors of the Epirots came unto the Conful, who (is was well known) carried not themfelyes found and upright in the entertaining of the Roman amity : howbeit, they had not levied a fouldier for Antiochiu. Charged they were to have relieved him with moneys; and deny themfelves they could not but they had sent their Embassadors unrouthe King. And when they pit tip a petition, that they might be accepted again into the ancient band of amity? this answer the Consulter inned unto them. That he knew not yet whether to range them withe number of enemies, or peaceable friends, and thereof the Senat should be judge; and therefore he referred their whole eptire cause to Rome, And to that purpose a trate he granted them of fourftore and ten daies. The Epirots thus O fent to Rome; presented themselves before the Senat, and which they stood rather upon these terms in recouning those things wherein they have not shewed any open hostility, than incleating themselves of those matters that were laid against them; they received such an answer, as whereby they might be thought eather to have obtained pardon, than to have made good and jufified their caule, The Embaffadors also of King Philip about that time had and ience given themin the Senat, who came to congratulate with the Romans, tellifying their own joy, and wishing

Philip, who had lien as an hoffage at Rome, was delivered unto them, for to bring home again who to his father. Thus was the war atchieved and brought to anend, which M. Acilust the Comil waged against King Antiochus in Greece.

The other Conful P. Cornelins Scipio, whole lot was to govern the Province of Gaul, before that he took his journey to that war which he was to make against the Boians, demanded of the Senat, that money should be affigued unto him, for to perform those plaies and games which R he had promiled by vow, as Vice-Prattor in Spain, when he was driven to a great extremity in a battell. This seemed to be a strange and unreasonable demand. Whereupon the LL, of the Senat ordained, That what plaies the Conful had vowed on his own head without asking the advice and counsell of the Senat, the same he should exhibit and let forth either with the issue of the spoils got from the enemies, (it haply he had referred any money raised thereout to that purpose) or else defray the charges our of his own purie. These plaies and games P. Cornelius represented for the space of ten daies. And near about the same time, the Temple of the great goddels dame Crbele (or Idea) was dedicated. This goddess being brought out of Asia, in the time that P. Cornelius Scipio (lurnamed afterwards Africanus) and P. Licinius were Confuls, was conveyed from the lea-fide into the mount Palatine. The Temple was fer out to be built at a price (according to C anact of the Senat) by M. Livius and C. Claudius the Centors, when M. Cornelius and T. Semprovins were Confuls Thirteen years after the bargain was made for the edifying thereof, M. Junius Brutus dedicated it. and for the honour of this dedication were the first stage-plaies exhibited, (as Valerius Antias mine author faith) called thereupon Megalefia. In like manner. C. Licinius Lucullus one of the two Dunmvirs) dedicated the Temple of the goddels Juventus in the great Race called Circui Maximus. The fame had M. Livius the Conful vowed fixteen years before, eventhat very day in which he defeated Afdruhal and his army. The same Livius in his Centor-Thip, went through and bargained for the building thereof, whiles M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And in the honour of dedicating this Temple, the plaies were set forth: and all was done with more devotion, because there was a new war intended against King Antion ni chus. In the beginning of this year in which these things passed, whiles P. Cornelius the Conful flaid fill behind at Rome, (for M. Acilius was gone forth a ready to war:) it is found in records, that two tame oxen climbed up a ladder in the fireet Carina, to the tile-roof of a certain house there. And the soothiayers gave express order that they should be burnt quick, and the ashes to be thrown into Tyber. Allo it was reported, that at Tarracina and Amiternam? it rained Rones fundry times. Item, That in Minturna the Temple of Jupiter and the shops about the marketplace, were blasted and smitten with lightning; and in the very month of the river Vulturnut; two ships caught fire from heaven, and were consumed. In regard of these searfull prodigies, the Decemvirs by order from the Senat went to the books of sibylla and perused them; and out of their learning pronounced, that a solemn fast should be now instituted in the honour of Cores, the fame to be observed and holden every fift year: also that a novendiall sacrifice for nine daies together could continue; and a supplication for one day: and that they who went in this procession and supplication, should wear garlands and wreaths of flowers upon their heads: lastly, That the Conful P, Cornelius should facrifice to what gods, and with what beasts, the Decemvirs would appoint and pronounce. When the gods were pacified, as well by the accomplishment of the vows accordingly, as by taking order for the expiation of those wondrous figns the Conful took his journey into his province: from whence he commanded Cness Domities the Pro-Prator (after he had caffed his army) to depart to Rome: and himself entred with his legions into the territory of the Bolans.

Within a little of that time the Ligurians (by vertue of a facted law that they had) levied and F affembled anarmy, and by night affailed the Camp unawares to Quintus Miniains the Pro-Confol, Minattur kept his fouldiers in order of battell until day within his hold, having an eye and circumped regard, that the enemy should not mount over the riench and defences in any place.

And artheday break he fallied forth at two gates at once: neither were the Ligurians repulsed (as he hoped they should) at the first charge; for they sustained and held out the skirmish above two hours, with doubtfull event on both fides. At the laft, when band after band iffued out and hill fresh souldiers succeeded in the room of the wearied, for to maintain fight, the Ligurians in the end (befides other diffresses, lost for want of sleep also) furned their backs. Of the enemies were flair above four thousand; of Romans and allies under three hundred. Two months after or fornewhat lefs; P. Cornelius the Conful gave battell to the Bojans and won the day; flew 28000 Generalies. (as Valering Antia writeth Jook 3400 prifosers Pained 124 military enfigns, 1230

Cornelius the Confidence first taken hostages of the Boian nation, and disletted them of the one half of their country to the inhabiting wheteof the people of Rome might if they would fend their Colonies; at his de-parture from thence toward Rome to an undoubted and affined triumph, licemed his army with commandment to meet him there and give their attendance upon his triumph-day. The morrow after that he was come, the Senat had fummons to affemble in the Temple of Bellona; where after he haddiscoursed of his acts and deeds archieved, he required that he might be permitted to enter the City riding in triumph. P. Sempronius Blafus a Tribune of the Commons for the time being flepped forth and faid," That his advice was that Scipio should not flatly be denied the honour of "a sriumph, but to put it offeo a farther day, And why? The wars (qd.he) of the Ligurians have " alwaies been joyned and linked with those of Gaul: which nations being so near together use et ever mutually one to fuccour another. If P. Scipio (after the Boians defeated in battel) had fol-"lowed the train of victory, and either himself in proper person with his brave conquering army "paffed into the territory of the Ligurians, or but lent part of his forces to Q. Minuting, who now "for three years (or fast upon) both been detained within those quarters in a war of doubting if-"fue, we might have seen an end ere this of the Ligurian war also. But now (for sooth) his fouldiers are dismissed, and brought home to accompany him & to solemnize his triumph; who might "well have been employed ttill and done good tervice to the Common-weal; yea, & maydo yet " (if the Senat be fo disposed) by deferring the time of triumph, for to make amends and regain w "that which by over-hastinels of triumph hath been over-slipped. And therefore, in my opinion "(ad he) they should do well to command the Consulto go his waies back again, and take his "army with him into his Province, &cto do his best and namest endeavour to subdue the Liguri-"ans alfo. He was the only man thought to forecast, and truly to foretell what would enfue. Whereupon the King himself in person, with those ships which he had ready rigged and turnished, failed to Chersonnesses, with intent to threngthen those places with good garrilons if haply the Romans should come by Land. The rest of the navy he commanded Polyxanidas to prepare and put to Sea, And al about the Island he fent about his pinnaces and briganting as espiais to discover the coasts. C. Living the Admiral of the Roman navy was arrived at Naples from Rome with fifty covered thips. At which place he gave commandment, That the open vessels, which by covenant were due to be tent from the allies of all that tract, should meet. From whence he failed to Sicily, and passed the streights by Meffana. And when he had received fix C Carthaginian thips fent to aid him, and called upon the Rhegins and Lo. rins, and other affociats comprised in the same league and holding by the same tenure, for that shipping which of duty they were to find, when he had also taken a survey of all his armado at Lagraium, he weighed and chor, and put to the main Sea, Being arrived at Coregra, which was the first City of all Greece, that he came unto he enquired in what terms the war-affairs flood? (for as yet all was not throughly quiet in Greece) and where the Roman fleet was? After he heard that the Roman Conful and King Philip, were about the pais of Thermopyle, and there lay in guard: that the fleet rid at anchor in the port and harbor of Pyracum; he thought it good to use expedicion, and to make speed for mil occasions whatfoever, and incontinently determined to fail forward to Peloponnefus. And ha-Ving stone instant waited Samos and Zacynthus as he went, because they choic rather to band with n the Stolians, he fet fail for Malea, and having a good wind, within few daies he arrived at Pyraeum where she old fleet anchored. At Styllaum King Eumenes met him with three ships: who had been a long time at Leina, unresolved in himself, whether he should return to defend his own Kingplora (for he heard that Amioghis made preparation at Ephofus for war, as well by Sea as Land owner to depart a foot from the Romans, upon whole fortune depended his whole state. Aulus Accilius, so soon as he had delivered to his successor five and swenty close ships of war, looked from Pyraeum, and came to Rome. So Livius with a fleet of eighty one ships, armed at their beakbeads with brasen pikes, besides many other smaller vessels, (which open as they were, had brasen heads, as is aforelaids or if they were without such pikes, served for espials) sailed to Delos. Hen L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lelius were Confuls, after order taken for the fervice of the Gods, there was no matter treated of in the Senate, before the fuit of the Atolians. And as their Embaffadors were inftant and earneft, because the term of their truce was but short, so T. Quinting, who then was returned out of Greece to Rome, seconded them. The Atolians, relying more upon the mercy of the Senate, than the julice of their cause, and ballancing their old good turns done to the Romans, to the late. harms and trepartes committed, used humble supplication. Burlo long as they were in presence before the Senators, they were wearied with their interrogatories of all hands, who fought eather to fetch and wring from them confession of a fault, then any other answers and when they were bidden to void out of the Senat-house, they cansed much debate within. For in the handling of their matter it was feen that anger bare more Iway than pity; because they were mobile much offended with them for being enemies as they blamed them for an unruly uncamed, and unfociable nation. And after much hard hold for certain daies together, they relolved at length neither to grant nor denythem peace. menes who was gone to Elas toward his fleet, within few daies after, with four and twenty covered ships, and more uncovered, returned to the Romans; whom he found preparing and mar-Challing themselves (alittle short of Phocas) for a battel at sea. Then set they all forward with a hundred and fifty close covered ships, and more open and without hatches : and being with fide Northern winds, at the first driven to the sea shore; they were forced to sail single in rank one after another. But afterwards, as the violence of the wind began to be allaied, they affaied to cross over to the haven Correus, which is above Cyffus. Polyxenidas, as foon as he heard that the enemies were at hand, rejoyced that he had occasion presented unto him of a naval battel: and himself firetched forth the left point of his fleet embattelled far into the fea, willing the Captains of the thips to dilplay the right wing broad, toward the land: and so with an even front, he advanced forward to the fight. Which the Roman Admiral feeing, flruck fail, took down the mafts, and r laying together all the tackling of the ships in one place, attended their coming that followed after By which time there were thirty in a rank afront, with which because he would make them equal to the left wing of the enemy, he fet up the trinkets or small fails, meaning to make way into the deep, commanding them that followed Hill, to make head, and direct their prows against the right wing neer the land, Eumenes was the rere-Admiral, and kept the rereward close together : but fo foon as they began to be troubled with taking down their tackling, he fet forward with all freed and half that he could make: and by this time were they in view one of the other. Two Carthaginian thips led before the Roman navy, which were encountred with three of the Kings thips. And confidering the ods of the number, two of the Kings came about one. And first they wiped away the oars on both fides, then they shewed themselves alost with their weapons, and w boorded her, and after they had either overturned or killed the defendants, they were mafters of that Thip. The other that was in fingle fight, and affailed but by one, feeing the other thip taken by the enemies fled back into the main fleet, before the was environed by the three enemies. Liwins chafing hereat, and angry at the heart, advanced forward with the Admiral ship alrong the enemy : against her, those other two which had enclosed the Carthaginian ship aforesaid, hoping to do the like by this came onward; which Livius perceiving, commanded the rowers to let their oars hang in the water on both fides, for the more flay and fleadiness of the fhip, and likewise to cast their iron hooks fashioned like hands, for to grapple the enemies ships, as they approached and came neer upto them; and when they were come to close fight in manner of land-fervice, then to remember the valour of the Romans, and not to hold the Kings flaves for men of any worth, y And with much more facility and ease, than the two ships before conquered one, this one for that gained two. By this time the main fleet on both fides encountred on all fides, and fought pellmell. Eumenes who being in the rereward, came last in place, after the conslict was begun, perceiving that Livius had disordered the lest wing of the enemies, made head against the right, where he faw them fighting on even hand, not long after the left wing began to flie. For Polyxenidas, fo foon as he saw himself without all question overmatched in valour of the souldiers, cansed the trinkets and all the cloth he had to be iet up, and purposed to flie amain. Those likewise that were toward the land, and fought with Eumenes, within a while did no lefs. The Romans and Enmenes, so long as the mariners were able to plie their oars, and so long as they were in hope to annoy the tail of the enemies, followed the chase lustily enough: but after that they perceived M their own thips (charged and heavily loaden with victuals) follow after to no purpole, and to lag behind nor like to overtake them which were the swifter, because they were the lighter staied at length their pursuit, after they had taken 1 3 ships both with their souldiers and mariners, and funk ten. Of the Roman Armado there perished but one Carthaginian, which at the first encounter was befet with two thips. Polyxenidas never gave over flight, but made was fill, until he had recovered the haven of Ephefus. The Romans abode that day in the place from whence the Kings armado came, purpoling on the morrow to make fresh fail after the enemy. And in the mids of their course they met with those 35 Rhodian ships covered, conducted by Pifistratus their Admiral; and taking those also with them, they followed the enemy even as far as Enhelm, where in the mouth of the haven, they rid in order of battel: by which bravado, having wrung as it were from N the enemies a plain confession that they were vanquished, the Rhodians and Emmenes were fent home. The Romans letting their confesor Chius, first failed by Phoenicus, an haven Town of Brythat, and having cast anchor that night, the next day they weighed, and arrived within the Mand, close to the City it self, where having sojourned some sew daies, especially to refresh their rowers, they passed forward to Phocas. Where leaving four quinquereme Galeaces, the seet animed at Cane, and because the Winter approached, the ships were laid up in their docks on drie Land, and for their fafety were trenched and paled about. In the years end the General affembly for dection of Magistrats was holden at Rome, wherein were created Confuls, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lalius. For now all men had an eye to the finishing of the war against Antiochus. The next morrow were the Prevors also chosen, namely, M. Tacciai, L. Agranculeins, Cneus Fulvius, L. Emylius, P. Brutii, and L. Atinius Sicily. Moreover that Conful, who was to be employed in Greece, had a commission granted, besides that army which he should receive of M. Acilius (and those were two legions to turnish himself with a supply of 3000 footmen, and 100 horsemen of Roman citizens; also of 5000 foot, and 200 horse of allies that were Latins; and befides, granted it was in the same commission, that when he was arrived two his Provinces he should pals over with his army into Aga, if he thought it so expedient for the Common-weal, Unto the other Conful was allowed an entire whole army of new fouldiers, confifting of two Roman legions, and fifteen thousand toot and fix hundred horse of the Latin allies, Q. Minutius had direction (by reason that he wrote how he had performed in his Province all that there was to be done, and that the whole Nation of the Ligurians had yeelded subjection) to translate his forces out of Liguria into the Boians countrey, and to deliver the same to P. Cernelius the Proconful. Out of that territory which he had taken away from them after they were vanquished. those City legions were withdrawn, which had been levied and enrolled the year before; and committed they were to the charge of M. Tuccius the Pretor, befides 1 5000 foot, and 6000 horse of Latine allies: and all these forces were to be employed for to defend and keep in obedience, Apulia and the Brutisns countrey, As for A. Cornelius the Pretor of the former year, who with an army had the government of the Brutii) he was commanded to deliver unto M. Acilius (if the Conful thought fo good) the legions transported overinto Ætclia, if he would remain there fill: but if Acilius would rather return to Rome, then A. Cornelius with that army, was to remain in Atolia. Thought good it was, that C. Atimus Labeo should receive of M. Amylius. the government of Sicily and his army : and if it pleased him, to take up and enrol out of that very w Province 2000 foot and 100 horse, for to supply and sulfill the broken companies. P. Junius Prutus had commandment to levy a new army for the government of Tufcany to wit, one Roman legion, and 10000 foot of Latine allies, and 400 horie. Allo L. Amilius the Admiral, was to receive of M. Junius the Pretor of the former year, twenty Gallies, and the mariners and oars thereto belonging; and befides, to levy himself 1000 mariners more, and 2000 footmen: and with those thirs and souldiers to fail into Afia, and to receive the fleet of C. Liviur. As for them that were already in the government of both the Provinces of Spain and of Sardinia, they were to continue therestill for one year longer, and to have the same armies at command. This year were two tenths of corn levied of Sicily and Surdinia: and order was given for all the Sicilian corn to be fentainto Esoliato the army: but out of Sardinia, that one part should be brought to Rame, T and the other transported over into Acolia, even to the same place that the other of Sieily aforetaid: State Color Separa rbial

Before: the Confuls ferforward into their Provinces, it was thought meet, that the Pontifies shouldgive order for the expiation of certain prodigies : for at Rome the Temple of Inno Lucina' was familien with lightning; so as both the lantern, yea, and the leaved dores thereof, were foully disfigured. Likewife at Pureali, the Town walls in many places, and one gate, was blatted with lightning, and two men befides were frucken dead therewith. At Nurfia it was for certain known that the day being fair and elect, there arose artsormy tempers, wherein also two free men loft their lives. The Tuiculans reported, that with them it rained earth. And the men of Reate brought word, that within their territory a female mule foled. Their prodigies (Ifay) were expiased and the Latine festival holy-daies were celebrated anew, for that the dole of flesh was not given unto the Lawencius, which of duty should have been delivered. Moreover, a solemnsuppligation was ordained, in regard of alberrours and faults escaped in divine service and religious observances. Also one of the books roff bylla, the Decemvirs declared and shewed, to what Gods, facrifice should be made: and ten young springals free born, and ten Virgins likewise, whose Fathen and Mothers yet lived, were employed about the minifery of those factifices. The Decem-virs also by night factificed young sucklings. And P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, before he sook his journeys, erected an archin the Capitol (over-against the high street that leadeth thirther) with 7 gilder fratues and 2 horses: and before that arch, he fet up two cesterns or lavers of marble. The Atolians, after their Embaliadors were returned from Rome and had made relation, that there was no hope of peace, albeit all their Sea-coafts (especially toward Pelaponnefus) were (poiled and wasted by the Acharans, yet minding more their peril like to ensue, than remembring their lois received, feized the mountain Corax, intending to impeath and frop the pattage of the Romans. For they made no question nor doubt, but that the next spring they would return to befiege and affault Naupattum. Acilius, who wish well what they expected, thought it better to go in hand with an enterprise unlooked for, and namely, to affail Lamus; for thus he thought, That feeing they had been already brought to a great strait and extremity by King Philip; now they might be taken suddainly and surprised at unawares, because they stood in fear of nothing lets, C Whereupon, removing from Elasia, he encamped first in the country of his enemies near to the River Speeduage from whence by night he diflodged, and advanced forthwith his enfigns, and by theday break had invested their walls round about. Great fear and burly there was, as in an accident unlooked for : yet all that day they defended the City more refolutly, than a man would have believed and thought they could have done in to fuddain a danger: whiles menitood at defence upon the walls, women fet up ladders in many places, and brought the men weapons and datts of all forts, yea, and fromes up to the walls unto them. Acilius, after he had founded the retreat, brought back, his men into the camp about moon: and after they had there refreshed their bodies with meat and sell, he gave them warning (before he dismissed the Presorium) that ere day-light the next morning they should be ready in arms: forthat he would not come back again with D them into the same, before they were mafters of the Town. At the fame time as the day before, be gave affank in many places; and for as much as the Townsmens strength decaied their darts and weapons failed, and above all, their hearts fainted, within few hours he wan the City. After had made a siddance of the pillage, fold fome part, and given a way the reft, the fell to take counsel what todo afterwards. There was not one man of opinion to go against Naupastum, confidering that the Asiolians held and kept the pair of Corax. Howbeit Acilius, to the end that he would not keep the field in summer without doing some exploit, and that the Ætolians might not enjoy that peace by the flacknes of the Roman foundiers, which obtain they could not at the Scrags hand, he supposed to besiege Amphissa and so the army was conducted thither from Hezaclas, by the aponetain Octos. The Ærolians wounded therewith anew, leeing they could win nothing neither by the mediation of the Athenian emballage, northe gracious answer of Africa canus, faid, they would make report thereof unto their States and country-men. So, they repurped from thence to Hypara, where they were to feek what to do, and could not refolve: for neither had they whereof to raise a thouland talents: and again, if they should absolutely put themselves into their hands, they leared to feel the smart thereof in their bodies. Therefore they commanded the same Embassadors to go again to the Conful and to Africanus, and to exhibit a petition, that if they were minded indeed and verity to grant them peace, and not by vain flew and semblance only to frustrate and delude the hope of poor suppliants, they would either rebate it them a quantity of that grand fum of money, or elle accept to of their absolute jurrender, that no free citizen might be touched thereby in his person. But nothing could be gotten at the Confuls hands, for to alter or relent any jot: thus was this embaffage allo fent away as it came, and nothing done, The Athenians came after them in place, the principal man of whose embaffage, Eche demus seeing the Ætolians wearied with so many repulies, and lamentably to no pripose bewailing the milerable estate of their country; put them still in some new hope, and gave them counsel to crave truce for fix moneths, that they might address their Embassadors to Rome and receive an answer from thence .: shewing unto them, that this delay could not augment their present calamity, which could not worse be; but contrary-wise, time and space coming between might affoord many accidents whereby their present misery might be mitigated and a layed. So by the advice w of Behedenny, the same men were sent once again, who had communed before with P. Seinie and by his means obtained of the Conful a truce for that term; which was the thing they craved. The fiege being raited before Amphiffa, M. Acilius, after he had delivered up his army into the hands of the Conful, refigned his government, and departed out of the Province: and the Conful likewise from Amphiff a returned into Theffaly, intending through Macedom and Thracia to conduct his army into Afia.

Then Africanus entred into speech with his brother, and said: "The journey which you end et terprile L. Semp onial Gracchus, a moft nimble and active young Centleman, was at that time choice for the fittell person to perform this action? who taking fresh post Hories all the way as he rode, with incredible celerity made such speed, that from Amphilla (for thence he had his dispatch) in three dayes pace, he arrived at Pella: The King was at a feast or banket when he came, and wine he had taken full liberally. And him ding him thus disposed to solace and recreat his spirits, he had no reason to suspect that he was in minded and inclined to any change or alteration and to for that time this gueld was bidden welcome, and had good cheer made him. The morrow after, he law the provision of vietnals in great flore ready for the armies, he beheld the Bridges made over the Rivers, and the high wayes mended and prepared, where patlage was difficult. With these intelligences he returned to the Conful, with as great speed as he went, and met timat Thaumadi. From whence, the army in much joy, and with greater and more affored hope; emred into Minedony; where all was provided to their hands. The King at their coming received them right hately and at their departure conducted them on the way as toyally. Very willing, ready and controons he shewed himlests which Africanier much liked and highly commended; being a man as in all other things fingular, foin allowing of elegancy and humanicy, if it were without interfluity and extels, nothing ale N and freight-laced. Thus they held on their journey burto Held Fortus, passing through Militaria and Threes, and Philip this act ompanied them; and provided all things the their one aftern that the well in many places is apounded as

The people there at that time were great warriors; keeping Billithe courages of Ganls for that the race of that nation was not yet extinct and worn our. His for Selevent he had left in East with an army to keep the maritime Cities in obedience, which Eumenes from Pergamus of one fide. and the Romans from Phocea and Erythra on the other fide, follicited to rebellion. The Roman fleet, as I faid before, wintered at Cane. Thither in the mids almost of winter came Eumenes with two thousand foot, and a hundred horse. Who having given out unto Livius, that great prizes might be raifed out of the enemies territory about Thyatira, had so perswaded and wrought with him, that he fent with him five thousand fouldiers: who being fer forth to this rode and expedition, in few dayes drove away a mighty booty. Amid these matters, there hapned a muting in Phocaa, by occasion of some that would have withdrawn and turned away the hearts of the multitude unto King Antiochus. The wintering of the fleet was chargeable to that City. The imposition of a tribute was heavy, in regard that they were put to the finding of five hundred fide caffocks, and as many coats for liveries: the fearcity of corn also was grievous noto them; for B which default the ships and the Roman garriton abandoned the place and departed: whereupon that faction which in all their speeches and assemblies drew the common people to side with Antiochus, was rid of all fear. The Senat and the principal citizens of Phocas were of opinion to contime to the last, in the affociation of the Romans: but the perswaders and counsellers of a revolt were of more credit with the multitude. The Rhodians were not fo flow the fummer past, but they were as forward now in the spring: for before mid-March, they fent out the same Pausiferatus Admiral of a fleet of fix and thirty fail And by this time Livius looled from Cane, and failed toward Hellefontus, with thirty (hips, and feven Gallies of four banks of oars, which King Eumenes had brought with himsto the end that he might prepare things necessary for the passage of the army, which he supposed would come by C Land. And fifth he fell with the bay or port which they call, The rode of the Achaens, from Where they whence he went up to Ilium, where after he had facrificed to Minerva, he gave gracious audience by fometimes to the embassages of the neighbors bordering, which came from Eleus, Dardanus, and Rhatium, again Tros. who committed their Cities unto his protection. From thence he directed his course to the threights of Hellespontus, and leaving ten thips in the rode over-against Abydus, with the rest of the fleet, he passed over into Europe, to assault Seffos. As the armed fouldiers approached their walls, the frantick Priests of Cybele called Galli, bereft of their wits presented themselves first unto them before their gates, in their folemn habit and vestments, saying. That they being the servants and ministers of Dame Cybels the mother of the Gods, were come by the inflinet and commandment of that goddes to befeech the Roman General to spare the walls and the City. And not one of D them had any harm done unto them. Anon, the whole body of the Senat with the Magistrats came forth to yeeld the Town, From thence they croffed over to Abydus, where (after many parlies in which they had founded their minds, and could have no answertending to peace) they addressed themselves to lay siege to the City, and to assault it.

Whiles these things stood thus about Hellespont, Polyxenidas a Rhodian born, but banished his countrey, and a Captain for King Antiochus, hearing that a Rhodian fleet was gone to Sea, and that Paulibratus their Admiral, had in open audience given out certain proud and didainful speeches against him, entred into a privat quarrel with him tossing and devising in his mind night and day nothing elfe, but how he might by some effectual and worthy deeds, check and confine those brave and glorious words of his. He dispatched therefore unto him as a mellenger, a man well known unto him, with credence and instructions to give him to understand, that himself would (if he might) fland both Paufistratur and his country in good stead : and that Pausistratus (if it pleased him) had means to restore him again into his native country. When Pauss first us marvailed herear, and was very inquifisive to know how this might be effected; and gave him his faithful promile (at his request) either to joyn with him in the action, or else to conceal all and keep countel: then the messenger declared, that Phistienidas would make over unto him the Kings navy either entire, or the greater part thereofic and in confideration and recompence of this la great demerit, he debred no more hur that he might return into his country. The importanked this matter was lo great, that he neither believed his words, nor yet neglected and de-Pishthe fame. So he went to Pamermen a place in the Land of Samos and there he abode to view and coshe thing that was offred unto him Courriers there can between and never would Paufift atus give credit to the party, until Polyxenidas wrote a letter with his own hand in the preforest of his faid messenger; that he woold perform what loever he had promised, yea, and sent the famelieners lealed with his own fign Manuel. By this fore pledge or gage, Paufifratus made full MOHIN that he had the traitor furely hound and obliged unto him. Forthus he thought, that

Watten to appear against himself-testified under his own hand-writing: so from that time forward the means of this pretended and counterfeie treason was devised and agreed upon. Polyxenidas gave him to understand, that he would of purpose lay aside and neglect preparation of all furni-C tage, that he would reither have rowers nor other mariners in any number about his fleet : moreover, under a colour of calking and callegring he would lay up some ships on dry Land: others he would lend away into the havens neer at hand, and keep some sew riding at anchor before Ethe smin the haven, and those (if he were forced to barrait) he would set out to fight. The same negligence that Payliferatus heard lay Palixenidas would use in his fleet the same himself present-

Ray steridue living as a subject under the King, would never hazard the danger of such pregnant

Polymenidas fill by talis ismblance encreased the encors and vain imaginations of Paujifratus: for H fome ships indeed he drew aland and hid up dry; and as if he means to hale up more, he repaired and amended the docks. Oremen and mariners he sent not forth out of their winter harbors to go to Ephe sus, but secretly assembled them to Magnessa. Now it fortuned that a certain fouldier ferving under King Autiochus, who was come to Samot about some private affairs of his own was apprehended therefor a py, and brought to Panormus before the Admiral Paufifrains, Who, being demanded what they did at Ephelius; I know not whether for fear, or upon mall lovairy that he bare to his Prince and countrey, discovered all: namely, that the fleet rid in the haven rigged. decked and trimmed in readiness: Item, that all the rowers and mariners were sent to Simples in Magnesia: Item, that some vessels, and those very sew, were drawn up to land, and the docks and harbors were shut up close: and lastly, that never at any time before, the navy was so carefully 1 looked unto, nor Sea-affairs so well managed. But the mind of Panfiftratus was to possessed before, with foolish conceits and vain hopes, that he would not believe these informations and intelligences for true. Polyxenidas having fet all things forward and in good readiness, by night fent for the rowers and mariners from Magnesia: and having in great half shot to Sea, and set affore those vessels which lay at one side upon the land, after he had spent the whole day, not so much in making provision, astriffing out the time on set purpose, because he would not have the fleet to be ieen when it fet forth, weighed anchor andloofed after the fun was gone down : and with 70 fail of covered ships, because he had a contrary wind, entred the Bay of Pygala before day, where resting all the livelong day for the same purpose as before, the next night he sailed to the nearest coalts of Samos. From whence he gave commandment to one Nicander an Archpirat, to let fail k for Palinurus, with five close covered thips, there to land; and from thence to march with his armed fouldiers over the fields the neerest way to Panarmus, and to come upon the back of the enemies: himself in the mean while divided his fleet into two parts, and made way to Panormus, there to keep the entry and mouth of the haven on both fides. Paufifratus at first was troubled for a while at this unexpected occurrent : but afterwards, as one that was an old beaten fouldier, he quickly took heart again, and calling his wits together, supposed that he might more easily repulse the enemies by Land than by Sea; and led his fouldiers in two Squadrons unto the promontories which bearing out into the Sealike two horns, to force the haven: from which two capes or heads he supposed that he might easily set back and put by the enemies with shooting datts from both fides. But Nicander who was fent by Land, impeached this defign of his fo that he was I forced fuddainly to change his mind and alter that course; and therefore commanded all his men to go a shipboord and away. Hereuponexceeding fearthere was both among the souldiers and also the mariners, as if they were to take their flight by Sea and not to fight, feeing themselves invironed at once both by Land and Sea. Paus fratus supposing the only way to escape and save themselves, was to make way through the month of the haven, and so to recover sea-room; after he had seen all his men embarked, commanded the rest to follow, and himself first plying and labouring hard with oars, scudded amain with his ship to the entrance of the haven. Now when The was once pair the fireight and come into the open Sea, Polyxenidas was there to welcome him with three Galeaces of five banks of oars, and so belet him. The poor ship was wounded with the iron pikes bearing out in the beak heads of the Galeaces, and to bouged and funk withal. The M defendants upon the hatches were overwhelmed with thot of darts, and among the reft, Paulifiratau himself manfully fighting loft his life. The rest of the ships were boorded and taken, some before the haven, others within: and some there were that by Wiender were seized as they laboured to loofe from the land, and to lanch forth. Five thips only of Rhodes, and two of Conselcaped cleer and fled, which made themselves way even among the thickest of their enemies, by the means of fearful burning slame of fire that they had with them. For they set me two long perches or poles bearing forward at the prow, like two sprit-fails, inevery ship, carying from pots and pans afore them full of light fire. The Gallies of Ernthrea, meeting the Rhodian this une far from Sameras they fled, the which were coming to help them, curred sheir course backward into Helleffontie, unto the Romans. About the fame time Silvers gained the City of Phocas by treaton, enthing in at a gaze which the warders fet open of purpose for him. And for fear, Cyma and other Townigh. that coast revolted unto him

Whiles these things thus passed in Asia, and that Abyan had enduted the steps for certain dayle by the desence of the Kings garrison that manned the walls: now that all were overtoiled and wearied, the Magistrats of the City (by the permission of Philosos Captain of the garrison) inside with Livius upon conditions to render the Town. The only point whereupon they shood, and which stayed the conclusion, was this, for that they could not agree whether the Kings soldiers should be lent away armed or disarmed. And whiles they debated hereabout, nows came of the Rhodians desea, and so the opportunity of gaining the Town slips out of their hands, For Livius seating, left Polyxenidas puffed up with the success of so great are exploit, would surprize the steet of that rid at Canae, leaving presently the steps before Abyans, and the garding of Hulleson, put to Sea afresh those thips that lay dry at Conse. And Emment Came to Eleas But Livius went to Phocas with all his steet, to which he had adjoyned two trivene gallies of Maylins. But when he heard say it was shery with a firong garrison of the Kings, & this Selector was encamped not for offsesse had pilled the sea-coast; and charged hall it his ships with a good booty school were prizes of men especially, he stayed no longer there than until Emmense might overrisk him with his sleet,

A but directed his course threight to Sames. The Rhodians upon the first news of this their overthrow, feared much, and with a might ily for rowed: for besides the loss of their Sea-souldiers and this, they loft also the very flour and frength of their youth for asmuch as many young Gentlemen of their nobility, accompanied Paufift arus, among other motives, in regard of his authority, which was right great and for good defert among his country-men. But atterwards confidering how treacherously they were over-wrought, and namely, by one of their own citizens, born among them, their melancholy turned into choler, and their forrow into anger. Whereupon they fent forth ten ships immediatly, and sew dayes after other ten, under the conduct of Examusthe Admiral over them all i who albeit he were not for other feats of arms and martial skill equal to Pauliferatui, yet they supposed verily he would be a leader to much the more wary and circum-B spect, as he was the leishardy and couragious. The Romans and King Eumenes first fell with the Iland Brithrea, where they stayed one night, and the morrow after gained the point of Correns, a promontory of the Teians. From whence when they purposed to cross over to the neerest parts of Samos, not waiting for the fun-rifing, by which the Pilots might observe the disposition of the weather, they hoiled up fails against a very doubtful and dangerous tempest : for the wind turned from North-east to full North, as they were in the mids of their course, whereby they began to be mightily toffed among the furging billows of the rough and angry Sea. Polyxenidas supposing that the enemies would take their course directly to Samos, there to joyn with the Rhodian fleet, departed from Bphe us, and first anchored at Myonefus: from thence he failed to an Iland called Macris, to the end that as the enemies fleet failed by he might take advantage to fet upon c either some ships singled and severed from the body of the fleet, or play upon the tail and reregard thereof. After that he perceived the whole fleet to be disperted by force of the tempest, he thought first to take that occasion to fall upon them: but the wind rising still more and more, and railing greater waves, because he saw he could not possibly come neer to boord them, he cut over to the Iland Ethalia, minding the next day to affail the ships in the main Sea as they passed to Samos. Some small number of the Roman ships in the beginning of the night put into the haven of Samia, which they found void and empty: the rest of the fleet after they had been cossed and tormented all the night long in the deep, at length light upon the same harbor. Where being advertised by the peasants of the country, that the enemies ships lay in the rode of Athalia, they fell to consult, whether presently to bid battail and put it to the hazard, or expect the arrival of the DRhodian fleet. Deferring therefore that enterprise (for so upon advertisement they were agreed ! they traversed to Corycus, from whence they came. Polyxenidas likewise, having staid at anchor in vain returned to Ephefus: and then the Roman Thips; while the Seas were thus cleer of enemies, failed over to Samos. Thirher also arrived the Rhodianfleet few daies after: and that it might appear how long looked for it was, they all presently set failfor Epbefus, with purpose either to try an iffue by a battel at Sea, or elle if the enemy refuted the tryal, to express and wring from him a plain confession of cowardise: which was a material point and of great importance to move the minds of the other neighbour-cities. Beingarrived to the very haven mouth, they embattailed their ships and stood directly affront opposed unto it. And when they saw none make tail nor see out against them, the one part thereof rode affore at anthor still in the very haven mouth; the g other discharged the souldiers and set them a land. Upon whom (as they were driving a mighty booty which they had raised by foraging all the country over) Andronicara Macedonian, who lay in garriton at Ephelas, fallied forth, even as they approached the walls of the City; and having ealed them of a great part of their prey aforelaid he chaled them to the Sea unto their ships. The morrow after, the Romans having beforwed an ambufft about the mid-way between marched in order of battail against the City, to fee if pt adventure they could train forth the Macedonian again without the walls: but perceiving that no man duff come abroad for impicion and fear of an awaite they returned to their thips again; and when they faw their enemies would not abide them neither at Sea nor on Land, in the end the fleet failed againgo Sames from whence it came. "go sesinft Ephrim with the whole armade, and thither to bring with me the velibrof burden H "charied with heavy ballact of gravel and land, and so fink them in the very baven mouth for to "cheak it up. And to make this bar against the haven it was a matter (faid be) of less difficulty. " for that the mouth and gullet of the bayen, was in manner of a timer, long, marrow, and full of " frelis and fhallows. By which mean I should have control the benefit of the Sea from the green. " and make him lose the use altogether othis navy. But no manthere besides himself thought well of this device. King Enmenes demanded, what shay would do then after this chacking up and Roppage of the haven paffage, by finking the flaips? whether they would depart from thence with their own payy at liberty, to help their allies and terrific and afright their enemies; or never the later fails, keep the haven (as it were) in fiege with the whole fleet? For if they departed, who could make doubt but that the enemy would pluck up those dams and bars that there lay I drowned; yea, and with lefs ado and trouble, open the haven again, than it was ftopped? and if they meant to sary there nevertheleis, to what purpole then was the haven four up? But contrary-wife, they within Ephelus (quoth he) being in furery for any danger from their haven and having a most rich and wealthy City of their own, furnished with all things out of Asia, would pais the summer season in rest and repose; whiles the Romans floring in the open wide Sea, exposed to the violence of waves and lying at the mercy of sempelis, should be driven to keep a continual guard, disfurnished of all things; and rather tied up and debarred themselves, for being able to effect those things that were needful to be done, than in case to empeach and shut up their enemies. Then Endamusthe Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, opined for his part, and fpake to the question, faving. That he rather disliked of that course, than knew himself a better, or could ad- x vise what was to be done. Epicrates the Rhodian was of mind, to leave Epbelon for the present. and to fend part of his ships into Lycia, for to affociate unto them Parara, the capital City of that nation: shewing two things of great consequence, that hereby would accrue. For both the Rhodians affured of peace, and secured from all danger of those quarters that lie about their Island might thereby attend wholly, and employ all their forces upon the regard of this only war against Antiochus: and also the Armado which was prepared in Lycia might be stopped and empeached for ever joining with Polyxenidas. This opinion imported and prevailed moth. Howhers hought good it was and agreed upon, that Regilles should present himself before Epiteles, with the mode fleet, to firike a terror into the enemies. And C. Livius was fent with fone Rhodian qual Gallies, and two Sanymean open thips into Lycia, with direction to take Rhoderin the marriand L with them there to communicate all his countels. So passing along by the wall fide of the City, they failed to the port of Phones that than two miles diffrant from thence, which was a fafe rode for their ships from all danger of the but high cliffs and rocks there were over their heads which commanded them, and chofailte Townsen quickly feized, with the affittament the Kings fouldiers whom they had integrition Against whom Louise fonc out the aid-founding of the Means, and the nimblest and shothering youngmen of the Saysnesses, notwich anding the landing places were very difficult unknown ward. A proper person to make a voyage thither with his whole fleer, and to affault the City with all the force he could possible. And having passed along Miletus, and all that coast of the associats, they disbarked from the gulf or creek of Bargilla, and came a land neer Iassu. The City was held by a garrison of the Kings: and the Romans wasted by way of hostility, the territory about it. Then Emplim fent certain to parle with the chief citizens and the Magistrats, to sound them how they were disposed, and also to sollicite them to revolt: but being answered again that it lay not in their own power to do as they would, he marched forward to give an affault to the City, Now there were certain Iashans, banished perions, in company with the Romans, who in great number belought and importuned the Rhodians, not to fuffer a City, so neer a neighbour and linked in blond unto them, for to perish and come to ruin, especially having no way offended: alledeings R that the only cause of their banishment was their loyalty unto the Romans, and by the same violence of the Kings garrifon fouldiers, were they also held in awe who remained in the City, by which themselves had been expelled. For all the Iashans in general were of one mind, most willine and desirous to avoid and shake off the servitude under the King. The Rhodians were moved in compassion with their prayers, and joining unto them King Eumenes also, partly by shewing the conlanguinity and kindred between them, and partly by pitying and lamenting the diffressed flate of the City (befieged, as it were, a ready by the Kings garrifon) they prevailed to much that they forbare to affill it. So they departed from theme, and because all other parts were peaceable. they failed along the coast of Asia, until they arrived at "Lotyma, a port or haven town even a- Misto gainst Rhodes. There in the Principia began first a secret whispering among the Colonels (which C afterwards came to the ears of Emylius himself) namely, That the navy was led away far enough off from Ephelias, where by right and of duty he was to war; to the end, that the enemy being left at liberty behind their backs, might attempt to do what helift without controlment, against so many Cities and States of the Roman allies, neer unto him. Emplus was moved herewith, and calling unto him the Rhodians, demanded of them, Whether the whole armado might ride conveniently within the haven of Patara? And when they answered No, he took that occasion to pass no further, but to give over the voyage, and so brought back his ships to Samos. In this same time Seleucus the son of Antiochus, after he had kept his army all winter time in Esta employing it partly in succouring his associats, and partly in tacking and pilling those whom he could not draw into affociation, intended to invade the confines of King Eumenes his realm, n whiles he (together with the Romans) was busied far from home, in assailing the maritime parts of Lycia. And first he approached Elas in countenance of an enemy, with banner displaied; but afterwards, leaving to befiege the City, after spoil made in hostile manner of the territory, he atterwards, leaving to beinge the City, after political and apital fitength of all his Kingdom. *Per gamus. Attalus at the beginning feemed rather to brave and provoke him unto fight with his strong guards that he had placed without the City, and excursions with his horsemen and light armour, thanto stand upon his guard and defence, and to receive the forces of his enemy: but at length, seeing by these light skirmishes that he was inno respect able to match Scheucus, he retired himself within his walls, and so the City began to be besieged. And much about the same time, Antiochus also being departed from Apamea, first lay encamped at Sardus, and afterwards, not far E from the camp of Seleucus, neer to the head or source of the river * Caicus, with a mighty army composed of diverse and fundry nations. The greatest shew of terror in this army was a redou- Girmalli. bled Regiment of Gauls, to the number of four thousand, hired for wages, who in with somesew other among them, he sent out to wast and destroy all parts of the territory about Pergamus. When news hereof came to Samoi, Eumenes at the first, being called away by this war, (begun at home, even at his very dores) made hast with his fleet to Elas; where finding in readine's certain hoffemen and footmen both lightly appointed, by their fure convoy and fafe conduct; he came to Programm bestrethe enemies had knowledge thereof, or enterprised anything. Where once again they began to make light skirmithes by way of excursions, for in truth Eumenes lay off, and was not willing to hazard the main chance upon a throw. Few dayes after, both the Roman and IF Rhodian fleer cante from Samos and were arrived at Elas for to aid the King Eumenes: When Amthorise was advertised that they had landed their forces at Elas; and that for many armadoes were mee together in that one haven, and hearing withal about the same time, that the Conful was already with a power in Macedony making reparation of all things for his passage over Hellofront : he improfed now it was high time (before that he were pressed at once both by Land and Sea) to treat for peace, and therefore he feized a certain hill over against Eles, to fortify and encampin. Where, leaving his whole power of Infantry, he descended into the plain, under the hetald to Emplies, he gave him to understand, that he was desirous to have a treaty of peace. Emplies fehr for Eumenes from Pergamas, and they both, together with the Rhodians, debated & incouncel what todo. The Rhodians refused not the offer. But Eumenes said it was neither homourable to parle of peace at that time, nor yet possible to conclude thereof, if they went about it. For being as we are (quoth he) pinned up within our walls and befieged, how can we receive from another, conditions of peace, faving our credit and honour ? and who will hold that for a firm and affured peace, which we shall contract without the presence of the Consul, without the seauthority of the State, and without the grant of the people of Rome? For I demand of you, when ye have made whether you will return presently into Italy or no? whether you will

This advice took place; and answer was returned unto Antiochus, that there could be no treaty of peace before the Contul his coming. Antiochus having thus in vain fought for peace. when he had first forraged and wasted the territory of Elaa, and afterwards of Pergamus, left his I fon Selencus there, and went himself in perion to * Adramyteum, pilling and spoiling all the way as he journeyed, in all kind of hostility. Now this territory is a rich country, called, The champain plains of Theke: much renouned by the Poet Homer in his poem; and in no one placebefides of all A sea got the Kings souldiers a greater booty and more pillage. Thither arrived also to Adramstreum both Emrlins and Eumenes (having tet a compass by lea) for the defence of the faid City. During this time, they fent for a thousand foot, and a hundred horse out of Achaa to come unto Elaa : all which forces were commanded by Captain Diophanes. So foon as they were disbarked and landed there were ready to receive them certain men fent from Atralus of purpofe to meet them, who by night conducted them to Pergamus, They were all old fouldiers, and well experienced in feats of war: and their leader Diophanes had been brought up and trained under Phi- w topamenes, the greatest warrior in those dayes of all the Greeks. Who took but two dayes for to xest his horse and men, and to take view of the enemies guards, namely, in what places and at what time they need customably either to come forward, or to retire. The Kings four diers were approached almost to the very foot of the hill, where the City is situate. By means whereof they might forage behind at their will, and there was not one issued out of the City so much as to lance a dart aloof against the corps de guard of the enemies. After they were once so neer driven for search that they were fain to keep themselves close within the walls, the Kings souldiers without began first to contemp, and afterwards to neglect them. Many of them had not their hories so much as fadled and bridled, and some sew were left in arms and in ordinance of battail; the reft were gone afide and fored over all parts of the champain: some went to play and took themselves to your hful spores and wanton riot: others fell to feeding pampering their bellies, and making good cheer under covert shade, and many were laid along afleep. Diophanes beheld all the manner hereof aloft from an high turrer of the City Pergamus, and prefently gave commandment to his fouldiers to take arms and to be ready at the gate. Himself went to Avialus, and told him, that he purposed to affait the enemies corps de guard. Attalus (although he were very loth) gave, him leave; for he faw in well, that he was to fight with one hundred horse against three hundred; and one thousand foot against four thousand, Being out of the gate, he sat him down not far from the enemies corps de guard, waiting when some good opportunity and occasion would official felf. Both they within Pergamus of one fide, deemed this to be folly rather than hardines ; and also the enemies on the other fide making towards them for a while, and perceiving them not to fir, altered nothing of their usual negligence, and that which more was, made a mockery and form of their small number. Diophanes kept his men still a good time, as if he had brought them forth only for a fhew, to fee and to be feen: but after he perceived once the enemies to be dist banded out of their ranks and ranges, he commanded the footmen to make all the half the scould after, whiles himfelf leading the way first among his horsemen, can with his whole troops she four as hard'as ever he could, and fetting up a shout and cry alond on all hands, as well with fooras horie, charged juddainly upon the enemies guards, ere they were aware of them, Man and horse both were greatly scared and the horses especially having broken their collers and half ters wherewith they flood tied, made foul work and much trouble among their own party. Some few of the hories kept their flanding fill unaffrighted, and even those they had much ado so fat a dle, to bridle, and to mount upon; with fo great a terrour came the Achaens, and with much more thanto imall a number could be thought to make. And as for the footmen in order asset ged and well provided they fell upon those that were negligently dispersed abroad erether look ed for them, and in manner half afleep. Great execution and butchery was committed upon them all the fields over, and they fied amain. Disphanes, having followed the chale as they make in featurering wife, fo far as he might well with lafety of himself returned to the guard and defence of the City, having won great honor to the metion of the Acheans by this exploit : for mor and the men, but women also beheld this service, and looked on him from the walls of Programme. The mest day after, the Kings Corps de guards were better ordered and kept closer together yea, and E tized half a mile farther from the City, where they encamped themselves. The Achaens like walks much about the fame time advanced to the very fame place. Many hours together they look one upon another who would begin first, expecting every minute when the charge should be given. But after the fun was neer going down, and that it was time to return into the camp. they of the Kings part began to ruffle their enfigns and guidonstagether, and let forward mith their bands, ordred in manner of a march for the way, more like than marshalled for to fight a battail. Disphanes fat fill fo long as they were wishin fight: but then he charged upon ther sereA ward, with as great violence and fury, as the day before, and put them again into fo great affright and trouble, that they gave them leave to wound them on their backs, and not one would flav to make head and refut but trembling for fear, and hardly keeping the order of a march, they were beaten into their camp, This boldness of the Achaans forced Selenem to dislodge and remove our of the territory of Pargamus, Antiochus after he heard say that the Romans and Eumenes were come to the defence of Advamytteum, medled no more with the town it felf, but after he had laid the fields wafte, departed from thence, and forced Peraz, a Colony of the Mitylengans. As for Cotton and Corylenus, Aphrodifina and Pryene, they were won at the fift affault, and io he returned to Sardie by "Thyatira, Se- + Tire. lencus remaining fill upon the fea-coalts, as he affrighted some, so he defended others. The Ro-Lewest remaining that upon the terrenes and the Rhodians failed first to "Mittlena, and back again Millian Rhodians failed first to "Mittlena," and back again Millian from thence, returned to Elea from whence the came. So they held on their courie to Phocas. and fell with an Island called Bacchius, fituar above the City of the Phocaans: and after they had pilled and rifled by way of hostility the Temples, which heretofore they had forborn, and taken away the Images (for the Island was magnificently adorned and beautified therewith) they croffed over to the City it felf, which they affaulted in divers quarters, according as they had divided their forces into three pages: but feeing that it might not be won with base scaling and strength of arms, without planting engins of battery and other fabricks; and befides, that three thousand armed men fent from Aztiachus for defence, were entred into the City, prefently they gave over the fiege; and the fleet retired to the Islands, having done no other exploit, but only pilled the terri-

C tory about the City. This done, it was thought good that Eumenes should have licence to depart into his own kingdom, that he might provide for the Conful and the army all necessaries toward the passage over Hellespontus: also that the Roman and Rhodian fleets should return to Samos, and there remain inguard, and have an eye unto Polyxenidas, left he removed from Ephefus and made some artempt that way. So, the King returned to Elea, the Romans and Rhodians to Samos, where M.

Emplies the Prator his brother departed this life. The Rhodians, after his funerall obsequies performed, lailed to Rhoder with thirteen flaips of their own, one quinquerem galeace of Cons. and the other of Guidos, there to lie in rode, ready to make head against the fleet, which as the bruit blazed, was affoat and coming out of Syria. Two daies before that Endamus lopfed from D Sames with the Armado, thirteen ships sent from Rhodes under the conduct of Admiral Pamphilides to encounter the faid Spriack fleer, taking with them four other ships, which were for the guard of Caria, delivered from fiege Dadala, and other petty forts which the Kings fouldiers affailed. Then it was advised that Endamus should incontinuedly set forward on his voyage. And to that seet which he had under his charge he adjoyned also four open ships. Being departed he made fall in all hafterhat he possibly could, and arrived at the port called Megiste: where he overtook those that were gone before; from whence they came in one band and train scyntly together unto Phaselie, and then they judged it the best way, in that place to astend the coming of the roomy. But at one instant the Rhodians cast off all fear, as well in regard of the goodness of their ships, as of their own experience and usual practice in service artea. For their ships with great quicknels and agility making fail into the main fea, made room for every one that came after along the land fide: and withall, if any one hapned to run upon a ship of the enemies with her piked beak head, either it rent the prow, or wiped away the oars, or paffing clear through between the ranks and files turned again and charged upon the poop. But the thing which terrified the enemy most was this, That a great galleace of the Kings which had seven banks of oars on a side, was bouged and took a leak with one only knock, that it received by a Rhodian ship far less: whereupon the right wing of the enemy doubtless enclined to flie away. But Annihal v preffed Endamus very much in the open fea, most of all with multitude of ships: for otherwise in all refrects Eudamis had the odds and better hand of him by far: and certainly he had compatfed and enclosed Eudamus round, but that a flag was put out of the Admirall, (by which fignall the differfed thips are wont to rally themselves together:) whereupon all those that had got the better of the enemy in the right wing, made hafte to joyn in one for to fuccour their fellows Then Annibal also and the ships about him, took their flight: but the Rhodians were not able to make way after them and to maintain the chase, by reason that the rowers many of them were fick, and therefore the fooner weary. Whereupon they cast anchor in the main sea, and staid to eat and take some refection for to strengthen their bodies. And in this while Endamus espied and beheld the enemies how they haled and towed by ropes at the tail of the open ships (that went w only with oars) certain other which were lame maimed, fore bruised, and cracked and might see 20 others not much founder than they, to leave the rest and depart: wherenpon causing an Ores and filence to be made from an high turret in the fore-castle of the Admirall, Arise my hearts (faith he) and see a pleasant sight yonder and a goodly spectacle. So they all arose at once and beheld how the enemies were afraid and what poor shift they made in haste to flie, and with one voice they all in a manner cried out to follow after and pursue them. Now Eudamus his own ship was shaken in many places and fore bruised; whereupon he commanded Pamphilidas and Charicipus to make way after them, so far forth as they thought they might without danger. And for a good time they held them in chase: but seeing Annibal approaching near the shore and fearing left the wind would lock them within the enemies coast, they returned toward Endamus, and drew along t with them the great galleace which they took and which at the first encounter was pierced and with much ado trained it to Thaselis. From thence they retired themselves to Rhodes, not to joyous for this victory, as blaming one another that they had not either funk or taken the whole fleet of the enemies, having so good means as they had to do it. Annil al daunted with this one infortunate battell, durst not even then pass along the river of Lycia, but delired to joyn tinto the old fleet of the Kings as food as possibly he could. To impeach him for effecting that, the Rhodians set out Charielitus and twenty war flips with piked flems, toward Patara and the Port of Megiffe; and commanded Eudamus to return unto the Romans to Samos with leven of the taleff thins in all the fleet whereof he had the command: to the end; that he might induce the Romans with his counsell and advice, yea, and with all the countenance and authority that he had, force them to lay M fiege unto Patara and to affault it. The Romans took great joy and contentment, first at the news and report of this victory, and afterwards at the return of the Rhodians. And it feemed, if that one City flood not in their way to flay them, and that they were once red of that care, they would without any let and empeachment, make all the lea coaffs for enough for any danger and damage from those quarters. But because Antiochus was departed from Sardis, the Romans held them back; and would not suffer them to abandon the guard and defence of Ability and Johia; for fear lest the Cities upon the fea-fide might be surprised. And so they sent Psimphilidas with four covered fhibs to the fleet that lay about Patara.

But the chief thing of all that most confirmed the mind of K. Prussas, was the com-B ing of Leonas unto him in embaffage from Rome, he, who aforetime in quality of Prator, had been Admiral of the navy. Who shewed and declared unto him, how the hope of victory was much more assured to the Romans than to K. Antiochus; and withall how the Romans would be the fatter and furer friend of the twain, yea, and make more conscience of keeping amity, Antiochus being put besides all hope of the association with Prusus, departed to Ephesus from Surdia, to wife and fee the fleet, which for certain months had been rigged and in readiness: and this he did the rather, because he saw that he could not hold our with the Roman army and the two Scipporthe commanders thereof, than for that his fea-fervice in it felf at any time before sped well, or could afture him now of great and certain fuccels. Yet fome little dram he had of good hope for the present in that his intelligence was, that a great part of the Rhodian sleet was about C Patares, and King Eumenes also with all his own ships departed into Hellespontus, to meet with the

Conful. Befides this, in some measure his spirit was puffed up with the remembrance, how the Rhodian Armado had been deleated at Samos by a cautelous plot and practice contrived beforehand Having laid thele conceits for a ground, he fent Polyxenidas away with his navy, to hazard the fortune of a battel in some fort or other (it made no matter how :) whiles himself in person led his whole army to Notium (a town of the Colophonians, feated upon the fea, and diltant abouttwo miles from the ancient City Colophon.) The City it felf he had a good mind to conquer and bring in subjection unto him: for, being so near unto Ephe sas it was, there could not any thing bedone either by sea or land, but it was within the eye of the Colophonians, and by their · means nothind freight waies to the Romans Now he made full account that they would remove Detheir fleet from Samos to succour that affociat City of sheirs, and so Polyxemias might thereby take his time and good opportunity to except fome notable exploit. he had made to long abode at Samo; and performed no fervice. Nothing left thought he than this Polymenidas, whom twice already in vain-he'had challenged and bidden battell, would now but? g to fight, He reputed it allofor a diigrace and shamefull indignity unto him, that Eumenes his fleet affiled the Conful to wast over the legions into Assa, and himself was affigued and enjoyied to faccour and aid the City of Golophon besieged, the issue whereof would be so doubtfull and tincertaine: Endamm the Rhodian; who was the man that had detained and kept him fill at Samo; when he was definous to pais over inco Hellefpins; yes, & all the reft were infant with him they ingand doubsing now innerbetter it was; either to deliver his allies from fiege, or to delege the fleet again, which it in bedroomer anquifited; and fo to put the enemy quite beiddes the poffettion of the ina it than with the abandoning of his tonfederars, and betraying And both fea and land into the hands of Astiochu Ao depart inco Religion (where Emmes with his fleet was inflicient to hold him play and to quite that part of the wire which was committed to his thirde. in the deep fea afar off, they made all the fail they could, and fled. Yare of fleerage they were and H good of fail, by reason that their vessels were more light, and made of purpose to rid way, and hefides nearer they were to land. And therefore they had recovered Myonefus, before the fleet could come any thing near unto them, I he Prator thinking verily to force them out of the haven made after without direction of a skilfull pilot, and knowledge of the place. Now this Myonefin is a promontory or cape between Teios and Samos, a very mountain made in fashion of a steeple, broad enough at the foot, but rifing narrower ftill, and runnerh up to the top sharp pointed. On the main or land fide it hath one passage by a straight and narrow path. From the sea it is founded upon tocks, beaten and eaten with the continual furging waves of the fea, infomuch, as in fome places the cliffs that hang overa bear more into the fea than the veffels that lie under the harbor, take up of the fea. The Præt or with his ships durst not approach near unto those crags, for fear of be- r ing within the flor of the pirats, who were perched upon the top of those steep rocks, and so they from that day and lay off, At the last, a little before night they gave over that vain enterprile withont effect, and the morrow after arrived at Teios; and having lodged their ships within the harbor, which themselves call Gera streus, (and it lieth out at the back fide of the City) the Pranorset ashore, and sent out his souldiers to forrage the territory about the City. The Teians seeing how their lands were spoiled even under their very noses, addressed certain Orators to the Roman Admiral arraied all in white, after the manner of humble suppliants. And as they would have seemed to excuse their City, for having done or faid any thing against the Romans tending to hostility; he both charged them directly that they had relieved the fleet of the enemies with victuals, and also told them what quantity of wine moreover they had promised to Polyxenidas. But and if they K could be content to do the like by the Romanfleet, he would recall his fouldiers from pillage, otherwise he would repute them for his enemies. The Embassiadors aforesaid made relation of this heavy answer. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City assembled the people together, for to confult and conclude about this matter what they were best to do. Thither as it happed, was Polyxenidas arrived with the Kings Armado; who having loosed from Crlophon, when he heard that the Romans were departed from Samos, that they had chated the Pirats as far as Myone fus, and were now waiting and harrying the lands of the Teians, also that their ships anchored in the rode Geraisticus, himself also cast anchor overagainst Myonesus, hard by an Island which the sailers and mariners call Macrie, in afecret bay hard by, escouting and espying from this near harbor, what the enemies did and intended. And at the first in good hope he was to discomfit and L deseat the Roman fleet, like as he had beforetime the Rhodian Armado near unto Samos, by seizing the mouth of the haven, and empeaching their iffue forth. For this bay was in all respects like unto the other, lying just between two Capes, which meet so near, and in manner enclose the mouth thereof, that hardly two thips at once can go fortheogether. And to this purpose Polynenidas intended in the night fealon to take possession, and makehimself sure of the faid straights, there to place ten gallies under either Cape, which standing there at a vantage should from both points flank the broad fides of his enemies ships in their going forth; and withall out of his other vessels to disbark and land armed souldiers, like as he had done at Panormus, and so at once to affail them both by fea and land, and make anend of them for all. Which defignment of his no doubt had taken effect, but that the Romans, after that the Teians had promited them to do M whatfoever they should command thought it more commodious for the receiving of their provifion of victuals, to pass with their ships unto the other harbor which was before the City, to the open fea. Some say that Endamns the Rhodian, shewed the inconvenience and discommodity of the other harbor, by occasion that two gallies fortuned in that Braight to be so intangled, that they brake one anothers oars with juftling together. And among other motives the Prztor was induced to change the harbor, because from the land side there he should be within danger, confidering that Anniochus himfelf was encamped not far off. Thus the fleet being brought about close to the City fide, the fouldiers and mariners (without the knowledge of any commanders) were disbarked for to dispose & di pense the victuals and wine especially to every ship. But about moon-side a certain pealant of the country chanced to be brought before the Prztor, who gave N intelligence, That there was a fleet of ships which two daies already rode at anchor under the Maria; and that but a while ago, certain veffels of them were feen to weigh anchor, as if they would haife up fail and be gone. The Prator moved at this fudden occurrent, commanded the trumpets to found the alarm, and to give knowledge and warning that in case any were firagling abroad in the fields they should retire. The Colonels he sent into the City to gather the souldice; together and the mariners, that they might repair to thip-boord. This alarm caused as great a trouble and confusion, as usually is seen in a sudden scarefire, or when a City is surprised by the enemies. Here was foudding into the City to recall their tellows; there was running our of the City to recover their thips; not knowing who commanded, by reason of the dissonant noise of mem and found of trumpet; howbeir, as hap was, at length they ran all toward the ships, but in such a O hurly-burly and dilorder that they carcely knew their own veffelsior if they did they could hardly for the croud and press, get thither and embark themselves. Neither had this affright passed clear without danger both by sea and land, but that Empline gave direction to every one what Lodo, and put out of the haven first himself with the Admiral ship into the open fea. & there received every vessell as they followed one after another in their order, & ranged them all affront: and if Endamus also with the Rhodian fleet had not staid at the shore to see good order, that the

if folleliers might be fet aboord without hurrying in fearfull hafes, and every shipsgo forth as de was sitted and made ready, by this means both the formout of they arguard were arranged in the fight of the Prayor, and the Rhodians also kept their order in the respuardin such fort, as they put themselves into the openies in as good array, as if they had seen the Kings sites under fail. But they were between the two promontonies, dependent and Corpout, before they deferied the enemy. The Kings Armado came forward in long files, two and two in a rank, who displated and spread themselves also affinent towards the wing in such wiesthat they might be able to compais and enclose the right wing of the enemy. Which Endamus the rere-admiral perceiving, and seeing withall that the Romans could not possibly make head alike and extend themselves as broad as the effects, and were at the point already at the right wing to be environed, made has evith his own

B veffels (for the Rhodian barks were of all other in the whole fleet (writteft by far) and after he had fronted equally and matched wing for wing, he made head with his own fhip against the very admirall of the enemies, wherein Polyxenidas himself was aboord. By this time the bartell began between both the main fleets, all at once from every part. Of the Romans fide therefought fonctione in all, whereof two and twenty were Rhodians. The enemies armado consisted of founciore and nine, all ships of greatest bulk and making, and had among them three galeaces of fix banks of oars on a side, and two offeven. For goodness and strength of ships, as allo for valour of fooldiers, the Romans sa superfied the Rhodians. But for agility and nimbleness of their vessels, for skiffull knowledge of Pilots, and expect cunning and readiness of mariners, the Rhodians were as much beyond them. And those above all the rest that carried fire before them in their noses.

C troubled and feared the enemies most: and that stratagem and device which had been their only help and means of safety, when they were surprised and bester at Panarmasa, was now the thing that stood them in best stead to win the victory. For the Kings ships searing the fire that threatned their very faces, turned aside, because they would not run as from with their prows: so as, they neither could themselves smite and hurt the enemies with their brazen pikes in the beak head, nor yet avoid them, but expose their own broad sides open to receive all pathes and violence from them. It any one fortuned to encounter and run upon them she was sure to be paid and speed with fire that was slung and cast into her: and more running there was to quench the same, than otherwise to sight. How bein, the resolute valour of the Romans souldiers (which ever in war prevailet most) was it that did the deed. For after the Romans by mere force had broken and clop wen the main battaillon of the enemy in the very mids, they turned about again and presented themselves behind, and plaid upon the backs of the Kings ships whiles they sought airont and made head against the Rhodians: and thus at one instant the battaillon in the mids, and the hips in the less with a served King Anticoheany were befer round about, and sunk to the bottom of the sea. The right wing as yet entire and sound, was more terrified at the loss and overthrow of their fellows, than for any proper danger of their own. Howbeit, after they saw the other inverted, and the Admirall her self with Polyacenidas in her, to abandon her companions and to hoise up fails, they likewise in has set graph as they could. Two and forty ships they lost in this sight; of which thirteen were boorded and taken for the use of the Romans, the self were either econsumed with sire, or devoured of the sea. Two Roman ships were shattered and broken in pieces, and some other hurt, bruised and cracked. One Rhodian charced to be taken by a notable and memorable adventure. For having with her piked beak head stricken a Sidonian ship, with the violence of the blow the shook out her own anchor, which by one of the flouks took fast hold as if it had been a graphing hook by the prow of the other ship. The Rhodians much troubled herewith, gave over sowing streight, as willing and defirous to be loose and parted from the enemy: and whiles they were buse thereabout, the cable which the anchor drew with it caught among the ours of her own ship, and swept them clean away, and so lest one side of it naked, whereby the ship being much weakned and enfeebled, was taken by the other that was smitten and tied fast unto her. Much after this manner was the bettel fought at fea near Myonefus, Where-F upon hwinches was foreaffrighted: for being thus disposseded of the fee, he distrusted himself that he thousand not be able to hold and defend the places famber off: and therefore commanded the garriion to retirefrom Lyfimachia, for fear it should be surprised there by the Romans. But this was but a had piece of council as the femall and if the proved afterwards. For it had been an sale matter not only codefied Lybrashia against the first assault of the Romans, but also to hold out the fiege all winter year, and by charting out the time othergth, to bring the very affailants themselves lying in leagues, to extrem necessity and want of all things: during which space they might have saken forme occasion and opposituaisy, to find a mean and make way for peace. Neither did he only quit, Lefembebia and lasse it for the enemies efter this unfortunate battell, but the raises his face before Colopbon and dislocked year and ettired himself to Sardie from whence haven into Cappadecia to Anim mention aid, and to all other places where he could, to gather more forces; and sow washeses upon no designesie, but so give battell, and to hazard all upon the late battell upon the sea. There he repaired and calked his ships which were shaken and cracked in H the forfaid highe : which done, he fent L. Emplius Scanrus with thirty fail toward Helleffontes to transport the army. And when he had rewarded the Rhodian ships with part of the pillage and honoured them with the navall spoils, he gave them the renvoy, and sent them home. But the Rhodians luftily out-failed Scaurus; and prevented his Thips to fet over the forces of the Conful: and after they had performed that fervice also, then they returned to Rhodes.

The Roman Armado failed from Chios to Phocaa. This City is feated far within the gulph of the sea, builded so, as that it lieth out in length. The wall containeth in compais the space of two miles and an halt: and from both fides it groweth narrow ftill; and meeteth in the midft, refem-*In Malonry, bling the form of a wedg or *coin, which the Inhabitants themselves call Lampter, in which place the City is a mile broad and a quarter with the vantage. From which canton or corner there I is a bank of firm land running a mile on end into the fea like a tongue, which divideth the haven just in the midst, marked out (as it were) just by a certain line. Where it joyneth to the narrow straights it hath two most sure harbors of both sides, and those lying two contrary waies. That which looketh toward the South, is called according as it is indeed, Neuftachmos | namely, a ship-rode, or harbour | for it is able to receive a great number of ships: the other haven is near unto the very Lampter aforesaid. When the Roman fleet was once possessed of both these most fure and fafe harbours, the Prætor thought good before he let in hand either to scale the walls, or to raise any fabricks and plant engins against the City, to send certain of purpose to found the minds and affections of the principall Citizens and the Magistrates within. But after he perceived they were obstinatly bent, and would not come on, he began to lay battery against it in two sererall quarters. The one part was not much peopled, and had but few dwelling houses in it; and the Temples of their gods took up a good space thereof; and there began he first to approach with the ram and therewith to batter the walls, and shake the turrets: and by that time that the multitude ran thither in great numbers, and presented themselves ready to defend, the ram was pushing also at the other part: So as now the walls were laid along in both places: and poon the fall thereof whiles some of the Roman souldiers presently gave the assault at the very breach. mounting and marching upon the ruines of the stones that were faln: others also assaid to gain the top of the upright walls with scaling ladders. But the townsmen withstood them so stiffly, and with such resolution, that it was well seen they reposed more hope of defence in arms and valour. than in the strength of their wals. Whereupon the Prator seeing in what danger his souldiers L flood, and fearing to expole and facrifice them ere they were aware to the fury of these peopleso enraged like desperate and mad perions, commanded to found the retreat. And notwithstanding the affault ceased and was given over, yet betook not the townimen themselves to rest and repose. but ran from all parts every one, to raile countermures, fill up the breaches, and repair the ruins where the wall was down. As they were wholly employed about this business, Q. Antonius sent from the Prator, came toward them: who, after he had reproved and rebuked their wilfull obstinacy, and made remonstrance unto them, that the Romans had more care and regard than they themselves of the City, that by continual affaults and batteries it should not utterly be destroyed and how if they would be reclaimed and forgo their outragious folly, he would make them this offer. That they should yield under the same conditions and in those very terms, as afore-M time they had submitted to C. Livius when they came under his protection: At the hearing of that, they demanded and had five daies space to consider of the matter: during which time they made means to receive some aid from Antiochus; but after their Embassadors whom they dispatched to the King, had made relation, That there was no succourte be expected from him; then they set open their gates, having articled and capitulated beforehand, that no outrage by way of hostility should be exercised and committed upon them. As the Romans entred into the City with banners displaied, the Prætor declared with a loud voice; That his will and pleasure was they should be spared, for a fmuch as they had yielded. Whereat the fouldiers on all hands fee up a great cry. That it was an intollerable shame that the Phoceans / who were never true and loyal confederates, bur alwaies dogged and malicious enemies) should go away so scotfree, and not suffer for their N fins; At which word (as if the Prætor had given them a fignall of ranfacking) they ran finto all parts of the City to rifle and spoil. Amylius at first staid them what he could and reclaimed them aagain, laying, That it was not the manner to lack Cities rendred by composition, but such as were forced and won by affault; and even those also were at the disposition of the Generall and not of the fouldiers. But feeing that they in their angry mood of sevenge, and coverous defire of goods, were of more power than the respective reverence of his person, his quality and commandment; he fent out beadles and trumpetters throughout the City; charging all persons of free condition whatfoever, to repair before him into the marker place, to the end, what no villany and ontrage might bedone upon their bodies. And to the Prescot did his beff to perform his world and promile in what foever lay in his power; for he reft oved time their Oliv, their tands and their O own laws. And for that the winter approached, he medechoice of the two harbours of Photeato bestow his ships there for the winter time.

Near about that time the Consul having passed beyond the borders of the Adrians and Maronits, received news, that the Kings navy was defeated no Myangus and Exfimite na disturbilled of the garrison : and this latter tidings was more acceptable and pleasing for o him ellen the other of the navall victory; and especially; when show close afficher w where in very much the City (plenteoufly

A (plentoully flored with all forts of victuals, as if they had been provided of purpose against the coming of the army) received them curteoully; whereas they made no other account, but to eadure extremity of want and painfull travell in befieging thereof. There they abode some sew daies as it were in camp, untill such time as their carriages and fickly persons of their train might reach unto them; such as they had left behind in all the lorts and catties of Thrace, wearied with long journey and enfeebled with divers infirmities. When all werecome and well refreshed and recovered, they put themselves again in their journey, and marching through Chersons fur, they came to Helleshom: where, finding all things in readiness for their transporting (such was the industrious care and diligence of King Eumenes) they passed over without trouble and molestation into the peaceable coalls of their allies and friends, without empeachment of any perion, notwithstanding Blome ships arrived in one place, and some in another. And this was the thing that much contented the Romans and mighting encouraged them to see they had so free passage into Asia, which they made full reckoning would have been a matter of great difficulty and trouble. After this, they encamped and made their abode a certain time near Hellespont, by occasion of those daies which hapned then to be, wherein the Salii nied to dance with their feutchions called Ancilia; during which time they made cruple of confcience to take any journey | until those Anolia were beflowed again in the I emp.e of Mars. By reason of which daies. P. Serpie also withdrew himfelf apareire in the army opon a more thrick regard of confcience & religion, which touched him nearerthan other, became he was himself one of the Salii, and was the came that the army staid behind and came not forward to overtake the camp.

And even then there happed to come unto the camp from Antio hus, one Heraelides a Byzantine, having in charge to treat as touching a peace: and good hope he conceived to obtain the fame with cite, by reason of the long abode and slay of the Romans in that one place: of whom he had looked for no other, but that as foon as they had fet foot in Afia, they would have marched apace traightwaies against the Kings camp. Howbeit this contie he took not to go directly unto the Conful before he had spoken and conserred with Scipio, (and indeed such direction and charge he had from the King himself) in whom he had reposed his greatest hope: for besides his magnanimity and noble courage, as also the latiety of glory and honour, whereof already he had his full (great inducements unto the King that he would be easily wrought and made most pliable to hearken after peace) all the world knew full well how fober y he had carried himfelf in his D victories first in Spain, and alterwards in Affrick; and more than Il this, a son of his was captive in the faid Kings hands. But where, when, and by what chance he was taken prisoner, writers agree not no more than in many things elle Some lay, that in the beginning of the war, he was befet and enclosed round within the Kings ships, at what time as he failed from Chalcis to Oreum. Others write, that after the Roman army was passed over into Asia; he was sent ont in espiall with a troop of Frægellan horiemen to view and discover the Kings camp: and when the Kings Cavalry made out to charge upon them, he made halte to retire, and in that hurry his horsefell with him and so he and two other men of arms with him, was surprised, taken, and brought to the King. But thisone thing is for certain known, that if there had been fure and firm peace between the King and the Romans, nay, if there had been familiar acquaintance and hospitality between E him and the Sospies, this young Gentleman could not possibly have had more friendly entertainment, nor been more kindly intreated, liberally used, yea, and honourably regarded than he was. For these causes the Embash dorattended the coming of Serpio: and io soon as he was arrived, presented himself unto the Conful, requesting that he might deliver his message and be heard. Whereupon in a frequent affembly he had audience given him, and thus hefpake: "Whereas "(quoth he) there have been divers and fundry embassages passed to and fro as touching peace, "and no good as yet done; I lay this for a ground and afture my felf now to speed, because the "former embassadors hitherto have effected and obtained nothing: for in all those treaties and "disputations the question was about Smyrna, Lampsacus, Alexandria, Treas, and Lysmachia, "which is in Egrope. Of which Cities, the King my Master hath already quit Lysimachia, to the F end you (fiould not say that he hath any one City at all within Europeand as for those other in Afa he is ready to furrender them also yea & all the rest what soever, which the Romans would er recover out of the Kings hands and dominions, in regard they had fometime fided & taken part "with him. And for the charges which the Romans have defraied about this war, the King will "be willing to disbusse and make good the one moity unto them again. And thus much pake he concerning the articles and conditions of the peace. The rest of his speech behind, was bete flowed in advertizing and purting them in mind of the alternative revolution of this world and the affairs thereof; that as they should pre their own good fortune and prosperity with meafigre and moderation to they ought norto prefs down others in their adverticy; but hold them-(elves contented within the bounds and limits of Europe, and that was a dominion fufficient (a man would think) and exceeding great; confidering this, that it is an eafier matter to win one e thing affer another by way of conquest, than to hold and keep them all together when they are "won. To conclude, if the Romans were minded to differenter any part from Afia, to they would "make an end pace, and limit out the same within certain precincts without any further doubt and difference, the King for the love of peace and concord, would fuffer the Romans in their unmeasurable desire and appeare, to surmount and outgo his temperance and moderation.

But those matters which the Embassador supposed were of great importance and esfectuall to obtain peace, the Romans made a pith at it, and lightly regarded : for they judged it but meet and H reason, that the King should discharge all the expences they had been at in this war, considering through his default it first arose: also that he ought to withdraw his garrisons not only out of Tonie and Aolis: but also like as all Greece hath been made free and delivered, so the Greek Cities likewife in Afia ought to be enfranchifed and fet at liberty: which possibly might not bennless Antiochin were differzed of the possession of all Afra on this side the mountain Tamm. The Embaffador perceiving well, that there was no reason to be had in the affembly, affaied privative found and to win the heart and good will of Seipis, according as he had in charge from the Kine. And first this way he went to work and laid, That the King was minded to fend him his son again freely without raniom: then (ignorant as he was both of Scipio his nature and the manner of Romans) he promised him a mighty mass of gold, yea, and to be made equal companion in the t government of the whole kingdom (the Kings name and royall thyle only referred) in case he would be an infrument and means to effectuate peace. To these motives and offers Scipio returned this answer, "That you neither know the Romans all in general, nor my felf in particular un-"to whom you were fent, I less marvell, seeing you are altogether ignorant of the state of him who hath fent you hither. For if ye had meant to have longht for peace at our hands, as of men who were in care for the doubtfull event and iffue of the war, ye should have held and kept Ly-" fimachia still, for to have empeached our entrance into Cherfonnesus, or eise ye should have made head against us in Hellespontus, and staid our passage into Asia: but now seeing we have granted " paffage into Africand suffered your selves not only to be bridled and curbed, but also to be voz-"ked, and like beafts to bear and draw too; fince I lay there is no remedy but ye must endure to H 66 be under our subjection what equal and indifferent means of treaty is there left for you? Now, " as concerning my ion, I will accept it as a great present, and beseeming the munificence and liberality of a King, in case he send him to me again. As for the other matters, I pray God I be ne-" ver driven in regard of mine effate, to have that need: for furely, I carry a mind that will never "find the mifs and want thereof. And for thesegreat offers that the King maketh unto me, he 6 (hall find me thankfull unto him, if it please him for any private benefit unto me done, to require "at my hands a private favour and pleasure again: but as touching the State and publike weal, he "thall pardon me; I will neither receive ought from him, nor beflow any thing upon him, And all "that I cando for him at this present, istogive him good and faithfull counsell. Go your waies "therefore and tell him from me, That his best course is to abstain from war, and not to refuse any L. " condition of peace whatfoever. But all this nothing moved the King, who made reckoning that any hazard and fortune of war would be good and fafe for him, fince that there were laws impofed upon him already, as if he had been quite vanquished and overcome. Whereupon, without any more parl of peace for this time, he bent his whole mind and employed his fludy about provision and preparation for war.

The Contul having given order for the execution of all his plots and defigns, distodged from thence, and marched first to Dardanum, and after to Rhoseum: the inhabitants of both which Cities came forth to meet him upon the way in great multitudes. From thence he went forward to Himm, and encamped in a plain under the very walls: then he entred into the town, and alcended upinto the Calle, where he offered facrifice unto Minerva, the patronels of that City. The Ilians M entertained them with all fnew of honour, as well in deed as in word, acknowledging that the Romans were descended from them, and the Romans again were as joyous and glad to see the place of their first original and beginning. From thence they removed, and the fixt day after arrived at the head or firing of the river Calcus. Thither also Eumenes the King (who at first assaided to bring his fleet back from Hedespontus, to winter before Elas, and afterwards, when he could not for certain daies double the point of Lettos, by reason of the contrary winds, went a land) because he would not fail but be present at the beginning of these great affairs, made haste the next way with a small power to the camp of the Romans, From the camp he was sent back to Pergamus, to give order for purveyance and provision of victuals: and after he had delivered out corn to those whom the Conful had appointed to receive it he returned again to the same leaguer. The Conful his pur- N pole and intent was to be provided aforehand of victuals sufficient for many daies, and together in one train to go against the enemy, before the winter surprised them. Now the Kings camp lay about Thyatira: where Antiochus hearing that P. Scipio was carried fick to Elaa, sent certain Embassadors of purpose, to present and deliver his son again unto him, At which present of his, he took not only great contentment in his spirit, as a father might do for receiving his dear fon, but much extement also and comfort to his sick body. After he had fatisfied bimielf at length with much embracing of his fon, "Te shall (faith he) recommend me unto the "King your Master and tell himfrom me, that I thank him most heattily, and that I have no good " thing at this time to fend to him again, but only this, That I advile him to take heed that he en-"ter not into the field to give battell, before he hath heard for certain, that I my felfam returned O to the leaguer. Upon relation hereof, Antiochia albeit he was in camp feventythouland foot, and twelve thousand horse and above strong (which pullant power otherwhile animated, and fed him with the hope of good iffue of battell) yet moved with the authority of fo great a perfomage as Scipio was in whom he reported his whole teringe against all doubtfull events of the forume in war,he retired back, and paffed over the river Phygins, and pitched his camp about Magnefin near unto Sypulum. And fearing, left (if he should be minded to make long slayand abode

A shere) the Romans would affay to force his defences, he cast a trench, fix cubits in depth, and twelve in in bredth; and this trench he environed with a double bank and course of strong stakes and pales, and upon the inward circuit and enclosure he opposed a more with main torrets for the more easie empeachment of the enemy, when he should pass over the trench. The Comul suppofing the King to be about Thyarira, marched continually, and upon the fift day came down into the plains of Hireania. And when he understood, that the K.was dislodged and departed thence. he followed him by the tracts, and on this fide the river Phrygius encamped four miles from the enemy. Where about a thouland hotlemen shewed themselves (for the moit part * Gallogra- * People of cians, some Dacians, with certain archers on horseback of other nations intermingled among Galatia.now them) who in great hafte having paffed over the river, charged upon the corps de guard of the called Galas.

R Romans. At the next they put the Romans to some trouble, finding them out of order and array: but as the skirmish grew hotter and continued longer, and the number of the Romans soon increased, (by reason their camp was so near to yield them succours) they of the Kings side being now wearied and not able to make their part good against so many of them, began to retire: and certain of them before they could take the river, were overtaken by those that followed the chale and killed outright. For two daies after they firred of no hand for neither the one nor the other went over the river. The third day after the Romans all at once paffed over, and encamped about a mile and a half from the enemies. But as they were pitching their tents, and bufied about fortifications and defences, three thouland choien horsemen and foottogether from the Kings Camp, came upon them with a great trouble and affray. The number of them that were in guard. C was less a good deal; howbeit, of themselves alone, without calling to help and aid the souldiers from their work about the fortification and defence of the camp, they nor only at first received the charge with equal valour, but also afterwards, as the fight encreased, put the enemies to flight, when they had killed some hundred of them, and taken prisoners almost as many. For the space of four daies next ensuing, both armies stood embattel ed on either side before their Camp. And upon the fifth day the Romans advanced forth into the middle of the plain. Antiochus came not forward with his enfigns, infomuch, as the hindmost were not an hundred foot off from the trench. The Conful perceiving that he fell off and would no battell, called a councill the next day, to be advited and resolved what he were best to do, in case Antiochus would not be fought withall. For confidering that the winter approached, the fouldiers were either to lie in the D field under their tents, or elfe if they minded for the winter leason to retireunto their garrison towns, the war mult be put off untill the next summer. Now the Romans never made so small reckoning of any enemy as of him. Whereupon, throughout the whole affembly they called upon the Conful with one voice to lead forth to battell out of hand, and take the fouldiers whiles they were in this heart ready if the enemies would not come out into the fields to pass over ditch and rampier, and break into the camp amongst them; making account, that they were not to fight with 10 many thousands of enemies, but rather to make a slaughter and butchery of so ma-

my beafts. Whereupon Cn. Domitius was fent to discover the way, and to view the place where was best entring upon the trench and rampier of the enemies. After he had brought certain relation of all things, it was thought good the next morrow to approach near unto their camp: and on the E third day the enligns were displaied forth into the midt of the plain, and they began to range the army in battell array. Antiochus likewise supposed it was not expedient to lie off and stay any longer, for fear lest in reining still to fight, he should either abate the courage of his own men, or increase the hope of his enemies, and therefore came abroad with all his forces, and advanced fo far forward from his camp that it appeared well he meant to fight. The Romanarmy flood embattelled in onemanner of form, as well for men, as munition and armor: for of Romans there were two legions, and of Latine affociats as many, and every legion confifted of five thousand four hundred. The Romans put themselves in the main battell, and the Latines kept both the points. The Hast at were placed with their entigns formost in the vanguard. After them the Prinsaper in the midft, and the Triaris in the reregard, Without this compleat battell thus marshalled, F the Conful fet to the right point the auxiliary fouldiers of Eumenes, mingled together with the targetters of the Acheans, to the number almost of three thousand, whom he ranged equally afrom, and beyond them more outward he opposed abous three thousand men of arms; whereof eight hundred were fent from Eumenier, the rest were the Cavalry of the Romans. Without all these in the outmost place, he put the Trallians and Candiots, who in alimade up the number of five hundred. As for the left wing, it feamed to need no fush fuccours, by reason it was flanked with the river and high fleep banks, how beit, in that fide there were planted four troops of horimen. Thus you see all the forces that the Romans had besides two thousand Thracians and Macedomians mingled and blended together, who followed as voluntaries, and were left for the guard of the Camp, and fixeen Elephants, which they bestowed in the rereguard for the defence of the G Triania, For, over and befides that they were not like to hold out against the Kings Elephants, which were in number fifty and four, you must consider that those of Affrick are not able to march them of India, lay they were in number equall; either because in bigness the Indians exceed the other (as in truth they aremuch greater by ods) or surpais them incourage and fromack. But the Kings army was compoled of divers nations, different as well in arms as in fouldiers. He had of Macedonians fixteen thousand footmen, heavily armed after their manner, called Phelangita; these made the main battell, and in the front stood divided in ten foundrons, parted and levered one from the other by two Elephants placed between! More H inward behind the forefront, the battell was displaind in two and stricty tanks of fouldiers: This was the frength of the Kings army, and as in other respects, to especially in regard of the Elephants furmounting aloft over all the fouldiers, represented to the eye a fearfull and tenthin fight. For bendes that they were high and lorsy of themselves, their crested headstalls with phones upon them, their turrets upon their backs, and in every turret four men handing in glitterine armour befides the Mafter and governor himfelt, made the apparence and thew far greater. On the right wing, he placed close unto the Phalangites, a thouland and five hundred horsemen of the Callogreeks: unto whom he adjoyned three thousand lances in compleat armour, mounted mon bard horses, and those men of arms they themselves called Caraphratti. To these were added another wing of a thouland horlemen, which they named Agema. Medes they were, elect and chofen men, together with more horsemen of the same region, mingled of many nations one with another. Close unto them in the rereguard was fet a troop of fixteen Elephants. On which fide alfo in a wing tomewhat farther drawn out flood the King his own cohort, bearing the name of Arginafoid s, by occasion of the filvered shields which they bare. After them followed 1200 Dacians, "archers on horseback. Then, three thousand footmen lightly armed, and composed nartly of Candiors, and partly of Tralleans, in number almost equall, and 2500 Mysians attended apon the archers. And the utmost tide and tail of that wing was guarded with four thousand Cyrtean ffingers and Elymean archers forted together. On the left wing likewife there flood fall unto the Phalangites aforefaid 1500 horsemen Gallogracians: and two thousand Cappadocians armedafter the same manner, sent from King Arearathes. Then the Auxiliaries of all forts 2700; p besides three hundred lances in compleat harness upon barbed horses armed at all pieces, and 1 600 other hortemen. As for the Cornet of the Kings, it was more lightly armed, as well themfelves as their hories but their etting out and furniture otherwise, all one. And these were Svrians for the most part, with Phrygians and Lydians together. Before this cavalry went the chariots of four wheels, and drawn by as many horses, armed with sharp and trenchant hooks like fith-biades, and the camels called by them for their swiftness Dromedaries. Upon these were monited the Arabian archers, who also were armed with keen swords four cubits long, that fitting as they did to aloft, they might notwiththanding reach their enemy. Then after thele were fer another multitude equall to that in the right wing, whereof the formost were certain horsemen called Tarentins, and after them 2500 Gallogracian horse Likewise of Neotretinisa L. thousand and of Carians and Cicilians one with another 1 500 armed alike. As many Trallians: and thred thousand to retteers. These were Pisidians, Pamphylians and Lycians: and last of all, thefrecours inthoseroguard of Circans and Elymeans, in like number as they that were placedin the right wing, with fixteen Elephants also diffant a pretty way alunder. The Kinghimfelf in perion had the conduct of the right point of the battell, and ordained Selenem his for and Antergree his brothers for to command the left. The main battell in the midft wascommitted to the leading and governance of three Captains, to wit, Minio, Zeufis. and Philipthe Master of the Elephants. There was a certain milt arose in the morning and as it waxed farther day gattleged alort into thick clouds; and made the weather dark : befides, by the South-windit resolved into a small driffing rain. which wet and drenched all. This did little harm to the Ro- w mans a but contrariwite, was much burfull to the Kings fide. For, albeit the air was dim and dark, ver by realon that the Roman battailions took up no great compals of ground, they could for all the air was overcast, discern from one end to the other; and the moisture that fell, dulled nothing at all (to speak of) either the swords or javelins of them that were heavily aimed: whereas the Kingsarmy being embattelled to broad, had much ado, and hardly could fee from the middle of the main barrell to the wings of each hand, and much less differn from one skirt and Ambiclosche battaill on to the other. Moreover, the dropping weather flugged their bows, forned their flings and loops of their dates. Their fithed chariots also, wherewith Antiochiu madefull account to break thear raies of his ententes curred to the dilorder and fright of themselves Now these chariots aforelaid were in this manner armed for the most part a certain sharppilles they N had about the pire pole, bearing forward from the fpring-tree, ten cubits inlength, like time horny with which pointed pikes they would pierce through whatthever they encounted. Allout en N'end of the laid fpring tree there were two blades flood out the one of jult and the height with it, the other lower and bearing downward to the ground: the former was devited to true through whatfoever came near the fide thorough the other to reach and tear them that were faln to the earth, or came under the charior, Likewife at both ends of the axeline with out whe nave of the wheel there were two fuch like hooks fastned and bended divers weies. Theig chariots that sented the King had placed in the Brone of the battell as we faid before, becaule if they had been the either in the middle or the refeguard, they fliend have been driven through their own battaillons. Which Emments perceiving one that knew well enough theman. O ner of that kind of fervice and how dangerous; it was to vafes man rather frighted the holles that charged them directly by ordinary white force the commanded the Candior archers and flingers, with some other horsenien what lanced darts, to run forth not thick in troops, but featuring as far another as they could; and at observem all parters discharge their shor upon them. This forerunning temper (29 it were) to madded the horse partly by galling, wounding, and peleing them with darts, arrows, and flones, dicharged from all fides at them, and parti-

The feven and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A with the firange and uncouth noise which they made, that suddenly as if they had been unbridled and without their geers, they flang ounevery way, and tab at random: which violence of theirs and without their geets, they happened they way, and said and our which violence of theirs the light armed fouldiers, the nimble flingers and swift findning Candiots avoided easily with a trice. And the horsemen withall following the chase, redoubled the fright and hurry amongst the horses, yes, and the deomedary camels too; which likewise were unruly and set a madding: and this hurly burly, the manifold cries from the multitude all about, helped well forward. Thus were the chariots chased in the middle of the plain between both armies: and when these vain bugs were once rid out of the way, then the alarm and fignall was given on both parts, and they charged one another in battell-wife. But as foolifh an occurrent as that was, it caused anon a discomfiture and overthrow indeed. For the auxiliaries and aids behind which were R placed next unto them, terrified with the fear and affright of the chariots, fled, and left all naked and and disfurnished even to the bard horses, in such fort, that when the rereguard was in difarray, The Roman Cavalry entred upon the forelaid horse, and charged them to hotly, that part of them was not able to endure the first shock and encounter: lome were put to flight, others were born down with the poise and weight of their harness and weapons. And presently therenpon the whole left wing of the battell began to retreat. And after that those succours were disbanded and in disarray which were between the Cavalry and the heavy armed footmen called Phalangitæ, the diforder and fear went as far as to the midft of the main battel: where to foon as the ranks and files were broken and shuffled together, by reason of the entercourse of their own fellows among them, they had no nse at all of their long pikes, which the C Macedonians call Sariffe. Then the Roman legions advanced their engins, and lanced their darts against those disordered ranks hudled together. The very Elephants that were placed between, nothing troubled and affrighted the Roman fouldiers, as who had been used in the African wars, both to avoid the furious rage of those beasts, and also either with their javelins to flank and burt them overthwart, or else if they could come near unto them, to hew them and cut their hamflrings with their words. By this time now was the front of the main battell defeated and beaten down: and the rereguard behind environed and cut in peeces: when as the Romans withall, might perceive their own fellows flying from the other part, and hear the cry of those that were affrighted, even almost as far as to their camp. For Antiochiu keeping the right wing, feeing in the left point of the Romans no other defence (by reason that they tru-D fled upon the river) but only four troops of horlemen, and those also by drawing themselves close to their fellows, to leave the bank-fide void and naked, that ged that point with his Auxiliaries and lances upon bard horses, and not only made head and pressed them asront, but from the river also fet a compass and enclosed them; and flanked that wing so long, untill the horfemen were first discomfitted, and then the footmen next unto them were pur to flight, fo as they ran amain toward their camp. M. Emplus a Colonell, and fonto M. Lepidus, who a few years after was created the High-Prieft, had the charge of the camp : he with his whole guard came forth, and whereas he saw them to flee, there he opposed himself, and first commanded them to stand, and asterwards to return to battell, checking and rebuking them for their beaftly fear, and shamefull running away. Moreover, he procee-E deed to minatory words, faying, That in safethey would not be ruled by his direction, they should sun headlong like blind beetles upon their own michief: and in the end, he gave a fign to his own company, for to lay upon the formost of them that thus fled, and caused the multicude that followed, with dint of word and drawing bloud of them, to turn their face again upon the enemies. Thus the greater fear overcame the lels: for feeing danger before and behind, first they staid their flight, and afterwards rethreed to the battell. Emplies also with his own regiment (which for the guard of the camp had 2000 tall and valiant men in it) withflood the King right froutly as he followed hot in chase upon those that fled. Moreover, Attalue (brother of King Eumener) in the right point of the battell, who at the first charge had diconfised sheleft wing of the enemies, perceiving that his fellows fled in their left point, and hearings great fiir about the camp, came to the refcue in good time with 200 horlemen, tiochus, manne law them turn head again whose backs estwille were toward him; and begin to fight swells, and perceived withall a number coming against him, both out of the comp and allo from the battell, rurned his horse head and took himself to flight. By this means the Romans obtained the victory of both the wings; and passed directly to the risling of the camp over the dead bodies, which in the main battell most of all were massacred and lay by heaps : where the firength and flower of the hardlest mentranged close together and the weight besides of their heavy armors would not give them leave routhe away. The Borfemen of Bankeles were the first of all others that purified the enemies: airer them, the reft of the Cavalry followed the chafe all over the fields, and ever as they overtook any of the hindmoff, killed them outright. But that G which troubled and plagued them in their flight more than all befides, was their chariots, elephants and samels, intermingled among them as they field for a finish as being once disbanded and put out of their ranks, they tumbled one upon another like blind meny and were bruifed and crushed under the beafts feet which came ranning upon them. Great execution allo there was committed in the camp, yes, and more in manner than had been in the battell: for the first that fled, and those that fought in the vanguard, took their way most of them to the camp, and upon affured confidence of this multitude, the garrifon within fought more valiantly, and held our longer in the defence of the hold. The Romans being chast still in the gates, and kept our of H the rampier which they thought verily to have forced and was, as their fart affaint; when they were conce at length broken through and got in, made the more blondy flaughter amough dam, were conce at length broken through and got in, made the more blondy flaughter amough dam, for kery anger and delipight that they had kept them for the florey. It is laid, that there were flain that day about fifty thousand footmen and 4000 horismen, a 400 taken philoners, together with fifteen klephants with their governors. A number of the Romans were hart and wounded, but there died not in the field above 300 toomen, and 24 horismen: and of the regiment of King Enments to that five and twenty. And for that day verily the conquerous after they had rankaked only the tents and pavilions of their enemies, returned to their own camp with great plenty of pillage: but the next morrow they fellto fpoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their prifoners together. And upon this victory, there came Embadiadors from Thyairra and Magnefus, unto I Spillus, for to furrender and deliver up their Crites.

Antischus, who fied accompanied with some sew, having gathered unto him many more in the way, who rallied themselves unto him, arrived at Sardár about midnight with a small power of armed men; and hearing that his son Seleneus and some other of his striends were gone before the Apamea, himself also at the south watch departed thence with his wife and daughter toward Apamea; after he had committed the charge of guarding the City Sardis unto Zeno, and appointed Timon governour of Lydia. But the inhabitants of the said City and the garrison souldiers within the Castle, despited their governours, and by generall consent addressed Embassadors unto the Consul.

Much about the same time also, there arrived Embassadors from Trailes, and Magassia (which K standeth upon the river Massadr) and likewise from Ephrius to yield up their Cities. For Palyarandus (advertised of the issue of this battell) had abandoned Ephrius; and having sailed with the sheet as far as Paras in Lycia, for lear of the Rhodian ships which rid in guard within the harbour of Megiste, disbarked and put himself a shore, and with a small company marched by land into Syria. The Cities of Asia were surrended into the hands and protection of the Consol, and submitted to the people of Rome. By this time now was the Consol possessed of Sardis, and thirter repaired unto him Scipio from Eleasio soon as ever he could endure the travell of journey.

At the same time there came an herald from Antiochus unto the Contul, who by the mediation of Scippo, made request and obtained thus much, That the King might fend his Orators and Embassadoreunto him, And after few daies Zenfes (who had been governour of Lydia) together L with Antipater (Antiochus his nephew, or brothers fon) arrived. Who first dealt with King Enmenes and communed with him, whom f by reason of old jars and quarrels Jahey supposed verky to be the greatest enemy unto peace, and that he would never abide to hear thereof : but him they found more reasonable and enclining to peaceable terms, than either the King their Masters or themselves hoped and looked for. So by the means of Scipio and him together, they had access unto the Conful; who at their earnest petition, granted them a day of audience in a frequent affembly, there to declare their Commission and what they had in charge. " Then (quoth Zeasts) " we are not so much to speak and deliver ought of our own selves, asto ask and be advised of you (Romans) what course to take, and by what means of satisfaction we might expiate and satisfac "the trespais of the King our Master, and withall obtain grace and pardon at your hands who are M "the victors? Minstan of Ligaria, and M. Arilins out of Estata. When the exploits were heard, as well of the one as the other, Minatias was flately denied triumph, but Arilas had it granted with great Confent of all mon: who rode into the City triumphant over K. Antochus and the Arolins. In which triumph there were extried before him 350 enlights, 3000 pound weight of malife liver in bullon; of coin in Attick Tetradrachus 113000 in Ciliophors 148000. Allo for crowns of gold 45 presented unto him by Cities affociat: besides all forts of rich spoils, and moreover he led divers noblemen prisoners, and last of all 36 captains, as well Ecolians as those who served under the King. As for Democritur, a great commander of the Actolians, who some few daies before had broken prison and escaped by night; he was by his keepers that made fresh suit after him, overtaken upon the bank of Tybir's but before he could be attached by them, he fell upon his own tword, and ran himself through. Only Deter wanted those that should have followed after his chariot; otherwise the triumph had been magnificent and stately, both for the pompous show and also of the honor and remon of explora atchieved. But the joy of this triumph was blemished with heavy tidings out of Spain, of a losse and overthrow received of the Portugals, in the countrey of Valcetans, neer the town Lies, under the conductor L. Emplim: where 6 too of the Roman army were left dead in the place, and the rest disconsisted and beaten back into the earnp; which they had much ado to defend and hold, and were forced to retire in maner of slight, and by long journess recovered the peaceable quarters of their friends. And this was the news out of Spain.

From out of France the Embalfadors of the Piscentins and Cremonians, were brought by the Protect L. Assuscations into the Senat: where they made much moan and complaint for default and want of inhabitants, whereof fome were devoured by the edge of the tword in wars, others confumed by m. lady and fickness, yet, and certain of them departed out of their colonies for weariness they had of the Gauls their neer neighbours. Whereupon the Senat ordained C. Latina the Conful to enroll, if he thought to good, fix thousand families, for to be distributed smong those Colonies sforefaids U. Assuscations the Pretor to create three Commissiness called Triumvirts, for the conducting of the coloners and inhabitants storefaid. And created there were M. Assilus Serramas, L. Valerius Flaccus the son of Publica, and L. Valerius Tappus the son of Caiss.

Notlong after, against the time of the Contain election which approached over, C. Laling the p Conjulreturned out of France to Rome, and he not only by vertue of the act of the Senat made in his ablence, enrolled certain Cofoners to supply the want in Plasentia and Cremona, but also proposed a bill, and according to it the LL, of the Senatordained, that two new Colones should be: conducted into the land that appertaine to the Boians. And at the very fame time were letters brought from L. Amylim the Pretor, as touching the bestell at fea fought neer to Myonefus : which letters also gave inteffigence, that L. Scipie the Conful had transported his army imo Afa. For joy of the taid navall victory, there was orthaned a folemu procession for one day, and in regard that the Roman army was then first on foot in Africate taid procession continued another day with impolication to the gods, that this voinge might turn to the prosperity and joy of the Commonwealth. And the Contait was enjoyined at each procession and supplication, to ig-G crifice twenty bead of greater bealts. After this enfued the folemn affectoly for the challog of Contuls, which was holden with great firife and comemion. For M. Emplos: Lepidas flood to be Conful, a min grown imp an ill name, and hardly spoken of among the people, in that he had left his government and charge in Sicily for this occasion and business only, without making suit unto the Senst and craving leave to to do. Together with him were competitors in election, M. Falvass Ribbiler, Ca. Markas Phys. and M. Palerins Meffata, But Falvas was choice alone, becaute the had reft not fufficient voices of the Centuries, and he the morrow after nominated Co.

Politamy we Albana, Lucya, Planta Maria, Mania, Done Dove.

During the time that M. Fulvius Nobilier and Cu. Manlins Volje were Con ul, Valorius Ansize writeth that there was a rife rumour railed at Reme, and held for certain, that L. Scipio the Conful, together with P. Africanes, were called forth to a parley with King Antischus, as touching the enlargment and delivery of young Scipio the fon of Africanus, and by that means were both of them strefted and taken prilaners: also that when thefe chief commanders were under arreit, the Kings army incontinently advanced against the Roman camp, the same was surprised and forced and the whole power of the Romans utterly defeated. By occasion whereof, it went I current alfo, that the Ætolians began to look aloft, refused to obey, and shook off their alleageance; also that their Princes and chief States were gone into Macedony, Dardany and Thrace, to leve and wage auxiliary forces : moreover, that A. Terenzius Varro, and Marcus Claudius Lepidus were fent unto out of Etolia, from A. Cornelius the Propretor, for to report their news at Rome. Laft of all, to make up the tale, he addeth and faith that the Æcolian Embassadors among other things being examined in the Senst about this matter, and demanded of whom they heard and underftood that the Roman Generals were taken prisoners in Asia by King Antiochus, and the whole army overthrown? answered directly, that they h d advertisement thereor by their own Embaffadors, who had been with the Conful. But because I find no other anthor besides him that maketh mention of this rumor. I date not for any thing that I can fay of my felf, report it for a cer- K

tain truth, nor yet omit it as a meer fable or loud lie. The Etolian Embassadors were permitted to come into the Senat house; and being induced fin regard of their own cause and present condition to confesse a truth, and as humble suppliants to crave pardon and forgivenels either for their fault, or milprifion and error, began with a bedroll of their favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome, yea, and in manner to upbraid the Romans with the valour which they the wed in the war against Philip, But with their arrogant and intolent language they offended the ears of the Senators : and by ripping up old matters done and past (time our of mind and utterly forgotten) they h indled their own course so, and brought it to this paffe, that the LL of the Senatbegan to call to mind much more harm and midchief contrived and practifed by that nation, then kindnesses and courteses received at their L hands : infomuch as the Ætolians having need of their mercy, incurred their heavy displeasure, and provoked them to anger and hatted. Being asked this queltion by one of the Senators Whether they would refer and submit themselves to the centure and judgment of the people of Rome? and likewile of another. If they could be content to hold them for their friends or enemies whom the Romans fo accounted; they answered not a word: and thereupon immediatly were commanded out of the Court : and prefently all the Senat began to cry out with one voice, that the Atolians were all fill for Kings Antrock se, depending wholly and only upon that hope, and therefore they ought to war against them as undoubted enemies, and to take down and tame the so proud and fellonious hearts of their own. Over and besides all this, another thing there was that incited and kindled the ftomacks of the LL against them, because at the wery same instant when they M feemed to require peace at the Romans hands, they warred against Dolopia and Athamania. So there paised a decree of the Sena, (and the fame was moved by M. Acilius, who had vanquished and modued Antiochus and the Erolians) That they flish void that very day out of the City of Rome ; and within fitteen daies next enluing, out of all Italy. Au. Terentisu Farro was lent to lafeconduct them on the way and this warning they took with them, that if ever after there came any Embassadors from the Etolians, without the warrant, licente, and permission of the chief General who governed the province, or not accomp nied with a Roman Legat, they should be reputedall of them for no better then enemies. In this maner were the Actolians dismissed & lent away.

After this the Confuls proposed unto the Senat, as touching the government of the provinces. N And thought good it was that they themselves should cast lots for Atolia & Afa. Unto him whole let it should be to govern Afia, was appointed that army which L. Scipic had. And for to furnish it fully u and make up the decaied bands, he was allowed to have four thousand foot men of Romans with two hundred horimen of allies that were Latins, eight thousand soot and four thousand men of arms, and with their forces he was to make war against Antiochus. The other Conful had assigned onto him that army which was Atolia: and liberty he had for supply of that broken army to levy the same number of Citizens and allies that his companion in government had enrolled. To the same Consul was granted a commission likewise to set in order, furnish, and take with him those ships which the former year were prepared and rigged, and not only to make w r with the Etolians, but also to tail over into the Isle Cephalenia. And withall, the said Conful O had in charge to return home to Rome for the election of Magistrate, if he might so do conveniently with the good of the Common-weal. For befides the annual Magittrats (who were to be chosen one under another) it was agreed upon, that Censors also should be created. But in case his affairs detained him, that he might not return in person, then he was to give advertilement, and fignific fo much to the Senat, that he could not possibly be present at the time of the aforefaid Election. So Atolia fell by lot to M. Palumi, and Affa to Co. Manlinio. Then the Pretors fell to draw lots for their provinces. Sp. Postumine Album had the jurisdiction over

A chizens and forreiners both: M. Sempronius Tudecaus: governed Sicily: and Q. Fabius Pillor the Quitinall Flamin, Sardimia: Q. Fabius Laboo was admirall of the navy at fea: and L. Plantius Hypfins was allotted to the rale of high Spain, and L. Babius Drove of the lower. For Sicily one legion was appointed, together with that fleet which was already in that province. Also there we sorder given that the new Pretor should impose two tents of corn upon the Sicilians, and send the one into Afa, and the other into Atolia. The like imposition was laid and cxasted upon the Sardini no, and the said corn to be conveighed into the same armies that the Sicilian corn was. A supply was granted unto L. Babius for Spain of a thousand Rom. Sootmen and fifty horse beddes: beddes it has the said a latin foot, and two hundred horimen. Unto Plantius Hypfens for the higher Spain were allowed a thousand Roman sootmen: with two thousand Latine allies, and two hundred horse Besset we said wed a thousand the provinces of Spain were allowed each of them one legion. The Magistrate and governours of the former year continued till in place of command for one other yeer, to wit, C. Lelius with his army, and P. Immiss also the Propretor in Hesturia with those forces which were in the province M. Tuccius like wise in the Brutians country and Apalaa.

But before the Pretors went into their provinces, there hapned a variance between P. Liginins, the Arch-Pontifie or chief Prelat, and Q Fabins Pittor the Quirinall Flamin, like unto that which sometime fell out between L. Merellus and Posibumins Albinus. For at what time as Posthumius the Conful was upon his departure and journey to his sleet in Sicily, together with C. Luftatius his colleague, Metellus the Archbishop for the time being, kept him back unon occasion of certain facrifices to be celebrated : semblably, when as Fabius the Pretor would Chave gone into Sardania, P. Liemins the high Prieft, deteined bim. Much strife and hard hold there was hereabout, as well in the Senat house, as before the people. Inhibitions passed to and fro. Cautions and pledges were diffrained fines they imposed one upon anothers head the Tribunes were called unto on both fides for to interpole their authority, and they appealed both unto the people. In fine, religion, and the regard of holy ritestook place, and carried it clear, and the Flamin was enjoined to obey the chief priest : and by order and expresse commandment from the people, all fines were taken off and forgiven. And when the Pretor for very anger and spite that he was debarred from his province, would have furrendred and refigned up his government. the LL, of the Senat impeached and terrified him by their absolute authority, and ordeined that be thould minister justice, and exercise civil jurisdiction between aliens. After that the musters D were ended within few dayes (for many fouldiers were not to be levied and enrolled) both Confals and Pretors took their journey into the provinces. After this, there arose a bruit concerning the occurrents and affairs in Asia, blown and spread abroad I wot not how, nor from what author it proceeded :but after few daies there came certain messengers with letters from the Generais of the Roman army, fent of purpole to the City, which caused not so great joy presently enining mon the trefh fear aforelaid (for why, they were no more afraid of Etolia by them already conquered) as dashed quite the fame and opinion that went on Antiochus, whom in the beginning of this war they supposed would have been a dangerous enemy unto them, as well in regard of his own pullance as for that he had the direction and conduct of Annibal in the war showbeit. E they thought good to alter nothing, either as touching the lending of the Conful into Afia, or diminishing his forces, for fear they should have war with the French.

Not long after M. Aurelius Cotta, a lieutenant of Scipie, came to Rome with the Embaffadors of King Anticobus, and likewise King Eumenes and the Rhodians. Cotta reported and declared first in the Senat, and atterwards in a full affembly of the people (by order and commandinent from the LE of the Councell) what affairs had passed in Spain. Whereupon ordeined it was, that there fliend be holden a folemn procession for 3 daies together : and order was given, that 40 Bead of frenter exttel from d be killed for facrifice. This done, the Senat affembled for to give audience to Ring Bameser first above, allother matters who briefly in few words having rendred "thanks to the LE, of the Senar, for that they had delivered him and his brother from liege, and o protected his realm against the wrongs and outrages offred by Antiechus: also having testified " his joy by way of gratulation for their prosperous and fortunat affairs atchieved both by land and " fee mamely, in that they had discomfited and put to flight K. Antiochus, & driven him out of his "camp that he could not keep the field and withall differzed and dispossessed him first of Enrope and afterweeds of all they pare of. "than from his mouth They all approved well of this (neach of his, and willed him to speak boldly without balliful modelly incharcated What he thought in equity and reason the Senat and people of Rome was to yeeldamanhim by way of justly recompense : assuring him that the Senat Would dulit more willingly mediliberally sist possibly they could) according to the worth of his defert. The King answered thus again, that incale any other had made him that offer, and given him the "choice of his own remards; he would gladly have used the counsell of that honorable court " of the Roman Senar (to the might have the means and liberty to aske their advice) to this end that while would not be thought; either to sugged measure in covetous defire, or passe the bounds of modelty in craving a recompense. But now considering they are themselves to give that reward, machinore reason it is that their magnificence and bounty to him & his brethren should be re-

But in case they had taken part and fided with Antiochas; how much more ft. ndethit with " wildom, nay, with equity and reason, to be respective of your allies who have so well-deserved "at your hands, then to regard your enemies. This Oration of the King much pleafed the LL, of the Senat, and foon it was feen by their countenance that they would deal nounteouffic and liberally with him. yea, and gratifie him in what they might. Then andience was given to a brief embaffige of the smyrneans, who by occasion that tome of the Rhodians were abtent, came becompanings or the smyrmeans, who by occasion their smyrmeans commended, in that they choic tween and delivered their mellage. Highly were their smyrmeans commended, in that they choice the companing of the comp rather to endure all extremities, then to yeeld themselves unto King Enrischus. Then the Rhodians entred in place : and the chief man of their embaffie, after he had declared the first occ fion and beginning of the amity which they had with the people of Rome, and shewes withall the good deterts and lervices which the Rhodians had performed in the wars first against Philip and then against Anciochus, went on and spake as followeth. "Right honourable, there is nothing more "difficult and troublefome unto us in all the bufineffe that we have in hand then this one thing, "that there is some variance and matter to be decated between us and Eumeces, the only K, of all the Rhodian "others, with whom especially every one of us in privat, and (that which toucheth us more)our "City in publick, doth entertain the bond of triendship and mutual hospitality. Howbeit nose-E "City in publick, dotte entertain the bond of interioring of this world and name it fell the "pugnancy is in our affections (my LL.) but even the course of this world and name it fell the "mightieft thing of all) which disjoyneth us and cauteth difference, this maketh us (being men "free born) to defend and maintain the freedom also of others : this is it, that moveth KK; to be " defirous to have all in fervitude and subjection under them, and at their command. But howfoe-" ver it is, our modelty and the reverent regard we have of the King person hurteth us more then "either the debating of our cause with him is otherwise difficult unto us, or the deciding thereof es like to be intricat and toublesome unto you. For in case it were so, this you could not honour "and reward a King, your allie and friend for his good fervice done in this war (for recompense "whereof you fir in consultation) by no other means, unlesse you deliver free Cities into his F 16 hands, to lerve in bondage; then were it hard for you to rejoive; for fear left either ye should selend away a prince (your friend and confederat) without guerdon and honour ; or feem to change "that landable enterprife of yours which you have begun, to ftain and blemifb your glory now "(which you have acquired by the war against Pholip) with reducing to many Cities and States "into servitude. But your happy fortune caseth you right well of this difficulty and necessity, "that you need not fear either to empair your credit and favour with your friends, or to endamage "your reputation and honour among men, For (the gods be thanked therefore) you have atchieweed a victory, no leffe rich then gloridus; and sufficient (if I may to say) to discharge all your "debts, and fee you clear with all the world. For Lycannia, Phrygia both the great and the leffe, "whole Pifidia, Cherfonefus, and in brief all the confines of Europe are under your dominion. Of "all which provinces, if you lay but one by (which you will your felves) for K. Eumenes, you shall "mightily enlarge and amplifie his Kingdom : but, give him . Il, you will make him equall to the "Breatelt princes and monarchs that are; You fee then by this, that you may recompence and en-" rich your allies out of the conquest gotten by war, and geverthelets hold out your good custom "that you have begun; remembring alwaics what title you protended first in your war with Philip, "&now lately with Antischm: condering with al, what you did then after Philip was vanquill'd,& "what is required and expected at your hinds, now : not to much because you have used it alrea-

As for you, before you en-" joyed thele things, you defired them not ; fince then ye have now compassed the whole earth. " and are LL. of the world, you cannot politibly cover the fame any more. Warred you have and fought for honour and glory, in the fight of all the nations of the earth, who now this long time " behold and regard your name and empire, no leffe then they do the gods immortall. And I wet on not well, whether those things which we hardly come by be not with more difficulty holden & "kept afterwards, then they were purchated. You undertook to deliver & rid out of the fervinde " and oppression of Kings, and to maintain inliberty, a most ancient and noble State, renowned in " for their worthy and famous acts, and right commendable for their fingular learning and know. * ledge in all feiences. For your honour it is, having once received all this nation in your fafeeard " and protection, to defend and preserve the same for ever. And think not, that those Cities only " are more Greek which are built and feated upon the ancient foil of Greece, then their colonies " which have been drawn from them, & in times past went from thence into Afa: for the change of air and place hath wrought no alteration, either in the nature and complexion, or the maners "and fashions of the people. As for us, endevoured we have do better and better, and each City 66 hath entered into an honest contention and religious emulation to out-go and furmount their " forefathers and first-founders in all good arts and commendable vertues. There be many of you 66 who have been in Greece, many have visited the Cities of Asia, and fetting aside this only, That K we are farther diftant and remote from you, there is no difference and ods between us and "them. The Massillans, whom/ if possible it had been, that an imbred temperature might be alsetered and overcome with the firength and nature, as it were in the foil) io many wild, barba-"rous, and notamed nations, environing them round about, would have made cruell and favage salong before this day; we hear fay and understand to be in that request and estimation (by good es right, and their defert) among you, as if they dwelt in the very midit and heart of Greece, for " not only they retain ftill the very naturall language of their own, they keep them to their old se fashion of apparell and attire, and carry the same port in their gesture and countenance, but also of above al things they have kept and observed their customs, their maners, their laws and natural at disposition pure and entire, nothwithstanding the frequent commerce with those, in the midst L of whom they converte and inhabit. Well, the mountain Tanrm at this day is the limit of your sempire and figenory one way and therefore whatfoever lieth between you and that bound se you must not think it remote, but look how far your arms have reached, to far let your laws and " jurildiction extend. Let Barbarians, who know no other laws then lords fielts, have their Kings, co fince they take such pleasure in them, and much good may they do their hearts : as for the "Greeks, they must do as they may, and are not (we confesse) in io good case as you, howbeit sethey carry with them as brave a mind as your felves : and the day hath been, when they were Monarchs, when they conquered by their own tword a mighty dominion, and held the same es when they had it. Now they are content with that empire where it now is, nay, they wishit commy remain and continue there for evermore, where it is fetled at this prefent. They shall be M well spaied, and think they are well, to maintain their liberty by your force of arms, fince they "have no means of their own to defend the same, But (will some man say) there be certain Cities "that held a fide and banded with Antiochuril answer again, fo were some before that took part es with Philip, so there were that conbined with Pyrehm, as for example, the Tarentins and so stay nothing of other States, which I could name and rehearfe, even Carthage it felf enjoyeth "freedom and is governed by her own laws. Confider then my LL. what a precedent therein "eye have fet down to your own felves, and how ye ought to confirm and uphold fo good an examsple. You must resolve to deny that unto the covetous desire of Emments, which you would not egrant to your own ire against the Carthaginians, which they had most justly deserved. And N eas for us Rhodians, with what valour and louisty we have ferved and sided you, as well in "this war, as in all others which ye have had in these parts and quartets, we report us to our "own selves, and leave it to your judgment. And now in time of peace, we here present unto you "that countell, which if you will accept and approve, all the world will believe and say, That "you have born your felves more honorably in the utage, then in the atchievance of your victory. This Oration feemed to fit well the greatness and majelipos the Romans. When the Rhodians haddone, the Embassadore of Antiochus were called in. Who after the usual and shale manar of those that crave pardon, confessed the King was in fault, and humbly belought the LL. of the Senat to have more regard of their own accustomed gracious clemency, then remember the Kings tretpaffe, who had paied fufficiently for it already , and finally that they would ratific and con- O firm by their suthority, the peace granted by L. Seinie the Lord Generall, seconding to their conditions, which by him were capitalisted and fet down. So both the Senat thought good to admit of that peace, and also within few dales after the people gave their affent and . stablished the same. And this accord was foleannly confirmed in the Capitol, with the Kings Procurator or agent, to wit, Austpater, the chief of the unbaffage, who also was Austachus his brothers fon. This done, the other embalinger of Afra had audience, and were all dispatched with this one answer, that the Senat would lend ten deputies or commissioness, according to the an-

The seven and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

A cient cuftome of their anceftors, to liear, decide, and compose all their affairs of Affa. But the finall conclusion of all should be this, That whatsoever penalized to the dominion of Antischus on this fide the mountain Tsarnis, should be affigued to King Emmers, excepting the countries of Licia and Caria, fo far as the river Maander, all which must lie to the figury of the Rhodians. Astouching the other Cities of Affa, which had been tributaries to Assalus, those also were to pay tribute to Enmenes : but fuch as were sometimes homagers to Antiochus, those should be enfrancised and remain free. The ten commissioners whom they appointed were these, to wit. Q. Minutins Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minutins Thormus, App. Claudius Nero, Cn. Covnelius Merula, M. Iunius Bruins, L. Aurunculeius, L. Emplius Paulus, P. Cornelius Lensulus. and P. Alias Tubero. These men had plenary power and full commission to take order and deter-R mine asthey thought good, in all the occurents that were prefented in these flairs. But they had direction from the Senat, as touching the principal points: Imprimis, That all Licaonia and Physia both the more and the lefs, that Mysia, with the Kings chairs and forreits, that the Cities of Lidia and Ionia, except those that were free at the day of the battell fought with Anticobus, and expressely by name Magnesia neer Sipylus, together with Caria, which is called Hydrela, and all the territorie of Hydrela lying toward Phrygia; moreover Telmiffus and the forts of the Telmelfians, referving only that territory which belonged to Ptolomeus the Telmeffian; that all their countries, I lay, and Cities above writen, should be given and granted to King Enmones. Item, That the Rhodian should be enfeoffed in Lycia, without the foresaid Telmess. the forts and territory, appertaining fometime to Ptolomens Telmessins: which parcels, I say, were reserved as well from Eumenes, as the Rhodians. Item, to the Rhodians was granted that part of Caria, which lieth beyond the river Maander, neer to the ifle Rhodes, together with the towns, villages, fortreffes, and lands bounding upon Pifidia: except those towns which were free the day before the battell with King Antiochus in Afia. The Rhodians, when they had given thanks to the Senat for their granities, were in hand with them for the City Soli in Cilicia : they alledged that they likewife as well as themselves, were descended from Argor: by occasion of which confraternity and neer alliance, they loved together as brethren by nature : in regard whereof, they made petition that over and belides other donations, they would do them this extraordinary favour, asto exempt that City also from the servitude and subjection of K. Antiochus, Then were the Emballadors of King Antiochus called for, and treated withall about this matter, but to no effect. For Antipa-D ter flood floutly upon this point, pleaded hard, that the accord was past already, and might not be revoked or altered and that against the tenonr of the atticles and covenants therein comprised, it was not the City Soli, but also Cilicia that the Rhodians demanded; and never would they reft till they were gotten over the mountain Tanrus. Then were the Rhodians called back again into the Senar, unto whom the LL, of the Senat, after they had made rel tion how carnelt the Kings Embassador was with them upon the point, added thus much moreover and said, That if the Rhodians deemed in very deed that the matter concerned the honour of their City and State, the Senat would work all possible means to cause the Kings Embassadors to relent, how stiff and obstinate loever they stood. For this courtefie, the Rhodians thanked them much more heartily then for all therest before, and faid withall, that they would yeeld and give place to the arrogant ipirit

ing the City Soli, there was no alteration made. Whiles thele matters were thus debated and passed, the Embassadors of the Massilians brought intelligence, that L. Babius the Pretor, being in his journey towards his province of Spain, was entrapped and enclosed by the Ligurians, and many of his train killed outright in the place, that himtelf mortally wounded fled without his lictors and lergeants into Massilia, and within three dayes left this life. The Senat upon the advertisment ordeined P. Iunius Brains the Pro-pretor in Hetruria to go in perfou into the farther Spain, and govern the fame as his own province : but first to leave Herraria and the army there to one of the Lieutenants whom he pleased to make choice of. This decree of the Senat, together with letters from Sparins Post hamins the Pretor of p the City was fent into Herraria: and fo P. Innins departed as Pro-pretor into Spain. In which province L. Emplias Panius (who afterwards wan a right glorious victory of King Perfore) having the former year fought informulatly, now a little before the arrival of his inceeffor, gave bartell to the Lustanians with so army rallied and affembled in hat, in which the enemies were pur to the worfe and driven to file. One thouland eight hundred of them well strined were left dead in the field, 3309 taken priloners, and their camp forced and ramacked. The bruit that went of this victory let all matters in Spain in greater quietnels.

E of Antiechus, rather then feem to give any caufeor occasion of troubling the peace. And to as touch

The lame year upon the third day before the Calends of Innury, L. Valerius Flacens, M. Atsilins Serraums, and L. Valerius Tappe, the three Triumvirs, by order from the Senat, planted a *19. Decem-Latine Colony at Bolonie; and three thouland people were thirter fent to dwel. Every gentleman G by calling that ferved on horfeback had 70 seres of ground fet our unto him, and the rest of the coloners fifty speece. The land divided thus among them had been conquered from the Boises in Ganl: and those Ganls first had dispossessed rise Tuscuts of the fame.

This year there were many menof mark and name that fued to be Cenfors : and this competition as if it had not been of fufficient importance it self to move matter of debate, was the occasion of a contention and variance much greater. The competitors were these, T. Quintini Flaminins, P. Cornel. Scipio, the fon of Curus: L. Valerius Placeus, M. Porcius Caio, M. Cliudius

Marcellus.

Marcellus, and M. Acilius Glabrio, even he who had vanquished Antiochus and the Atolians at 11 Thermoppla. To this man last reherfed the peoples favour and affection, most enclined by reason of many congisties and largeffes which he had given amongst them in publick, by means whereof many, a man was obliged and bound unto him. The reft, being to many and nobly descended withall, took it to the Beart, and could not endure that such a person as he newly risen and come up, and a gentleman of the first head, should be preferred before them, whereupon P. Simprenius Gracebus, and C. Sempronius Rutilius, two Tribunes of the commonalty, commented actionagainft him to answer at a day, laying to his charge that there remaineth a furplulage of the Kines mony and other pillage gotten in the camp of Antiochus, over and above all that he either carried and shewed in triumph, or brought in accompt into the City chamber. Many and tundry denofitions there were to prove this inditement, as well of lieutenants as of colonels. But M. Cate 4bove all other witnesses was most noted: whosegreat authority acquired in the whole course of his life (which he had passed bithertoin all upright conversation and constant gravity) was much empaired and discredited now, with his white robethat he bare on his back. He being produced as a witness, deposed and gave evidence, that he had seen certain plate as well gold as silver, among the rest of the pillage found in the Kings camp, which he never could set eye on in all the triumph abovefaid. In the end, Glabrio, because he would bring some displeasure particularly, and most of all upon Cate, said, he would give over his suit for the Centership, since that there was another competitor as newly come up as himfelf (whereat the Nobles indeed took indignation inwardly, although they faid nothing) who purfued the caufe to against him, even with incredible, and inclimable perjury. Well, a fine was fet upon his head of a thouland affes. And twife w was the matter traverled, whether the mulct should be taken off or paid. But when the third day was come, and the party in trouble (Acilius) had quite furcreated to fue for the dignity, the people would not give their voyces as touching the paiment of the fine aforefaid, and the Tribunes also themselves let fall their action. So T. Quintin: Flamininus, and M. Claudius Marcellin were created Centors.

About the same time the Senat sate within the City in the temple of Apollo, in regard of L. A. mylius Regillus, who had vanquished the Admiral of King Antiochus in battell at lea; where be had audience given, and when he had declared what exploits he had done, namely, against how puissant Armados of the enemieshehad fought, and how many thips of theirs he had either funk or taken ; The LL. of the Councell with one generall confent and accord, granted unto him a na- L. wall trinmph. And he triumphed upon the Calends of February. In which triumph there were born in thew fifty crowns tave one, of beaten gold but nothing that flore of coin as fuch a royall triumph required, only there were carried in pomp, 34700 Attick tetradrachms, [132300 ciltophors. After this (by decree of the Senat) there were processions celebrated in consideration that L. Amylius Paulus had brought his affairs in Spain to an happy iffue.

Not long after L. Scipio came also into the City, who because he would not be inferiour to his brother in the bonourable addition of his name, caufed himfelf to be furnamed Affaticus. He discoursed before the Senat, and in the publick audience of the people, as touching his worthy acts. Divers there were who construed the thing thus and said. That the war was greater in name then difficult unto him in the mannaging : for with fighting one only memorable battel the matter was M atchieved and ended, but the glory indeed of that victory was begun unto him and prepared for his hand at Thermopyle. But it a man should judg hereof aright, and according to truth, the battell of Thermopple may rather be accompted an exploit against the Etolians then King Antiochus. For what great forces I pray you had Antiochus there in the field of his own? But in the last battell imitten in Asia, the whole power and puissance that he had in all Asia, stood there to be feen, yea, and all the aids and fuccours which he could levy out of the nations as fir as to the utmost parts of the East. Great cause therefore they had both to render much praise and thanksgiving to the immortall gods, in as ample maner as possibly they could devise (for vouchissing unto them lobrave a victory as it was, and the same with such ease and expedition) and also to grant N a triumph to the General. He triumphed upon the last of February, even in the very day that maketh the leap year. This triumph of his was much greater then that other other of his brothers in regard of the magnificent pomp and thew repretented to the eye : but if one call to mind the substance of the things themselves, and compare the dangers, the conflicts and difficulties of the one war with the other; there is no more equality between them, then if a man should in comparison of captain, with captain, set Antischus to match with Annibal. He shewed in trumph two hundred thirty four field enlight and flandards : he carried before him the portraids of two bundred thirty fouctowns and Cities : a bundred thirty four teeth of ivory: two hundred thirty four crowns of gold; 237300 pounds weight of filver: 234000 Artick tetradrachms : 337070 ci-Stophores : 1,0000 Philip-pecces of gold : of filver plate, and that was all graven and chaled, a O thousand four hundred twenty four pound weight : of golden plate as much as weighed 1204 pound. Moreover there were led before his chariot 32 great commanders ; either governors of provinces under the King, or attendant in his court. Every fouldier ferving on foot, had given unto him " 25 deniers every centurion had double to much; and the gentlemen or knights triple. After the triumph done, the fouldiers had their pay double in mony, yes, and the portion of corn likewife was doubled. He had moreover given them already a double proportion in Afa, prefently opon the end of the battell. A year it was almost after his Consulthip expired ere be triumphed

And much about one and the fame time, both Co. Manlion and the Confulentred into Alia and O. Fabins Labeo the Protor repaired to the fleet. Moreover the Conful had work enough and wanted not matter of war within France. The leas were quiet after that Antiochns was defeated and subdued: Fabins therefore studied which way to take, and how to employ himself and his forces at fea, because he would not be thought and reputed idle in his province : so he resolved at length to put over with his flect into Crete. Now they of Cydon warred at that time against the Gortynians and the Gnofians, and the voice went that there was a great number of Romans and Italians, captives, living in flavery and bandage in every quarter of that Iland. He loofed therfore from Ephofus and fet fail for Candy, and so soon as he was arrived and set aland, he sent his mesengers about to the Cities, willing them to abandon their armor and jurcrease from war, and to fearch and teek up throughout all the Cities and territories those captives and pritoners aforesaid. to bring them to him and moreover, to fend their Embaffadors or agents, with whom he would treat concerning the affairs that in common touched as well the Candiots as the Romans. The Handers made imail regard of these messages : and uplesse it were the Gortynians, there was not one that delivered the captives. Valerius Antias hathaccorded, That out of the whole Hand there were rendred to the number of four thousand; because the inhabitants were frighted with threats of war. And that this was the caule why Fabius, although he performed no other exploit, obzeined of the Senat a navall triumph. From Crete, Fabius returned to Ephefus; from whence he fet forth three ships to the coast of Thracia, and commanded that the garrisons of Antischus should quit Anns and Marona, to the end, that those Cities likewife might be let free and en-

The first beginning and rising is fet down: also the time when at they feized first of those places which they hold. Here is recounted also the example of the rare valour and chassity of a woman, who being the wife of a certain King of the Gallogreeks, chanced to be taken prifoner; and when a Centurion had forced and abused her body, she killed him with her own hands. The Censors held a felling of the City : in which by computation were numbered 258328 pols of Roman Citizent. Amity was contracted with Ariarathes King of Cappadocia. Co. The eight and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Uring the time of the wars in Affa, the affairs also in Atolia were in smal rest and quietnels : which troubles arole first from the Athamanians, who after that Aminander was ditpossessed of his Kingdom, were held in obedience by garrisons under th captains of King Philip; and they bare themselves so proud, insolent, and outragious in their government, that the Atham mians found a great mille of Aminander, and were defirous of him again. Now remained he at that time as a banished person in Etolia; and upon letters received from his own nation (containing the flate wherein Athamania then flood) he conceived some hope to recover his crown again, whereupon he tent the meffengers back to Argithea (the chief City of Athamania) unto the principal men of the countrey, with this credence, That if he might be af fured of the affection and love of the people, he would procure the aid of the Atolians and come into Athamania. accompanied with the elect personages (and those are the councel of that paris on) and Nicander the Pretor. When he understood and perceived that they were press and ready to do him all fervice, he advertised them oftentimes upon what day he would enter with his army into Athamania. At the first there were but four persons that conspired against the Macedonian garrison and these took every one six more unto them for to be assistant in the execution of their complot. But afterwards trufting but little in this small number of their adherenes and complices (who indeed were fitter to keep counsell and conceal a matter secretly, then to perform any action valiantly) they adjoyned unto them the like number unto the other : fo as now they were two and fifty in all ; and they divided them elves into four companies. One crew of them went to Heratlea; another to Tetraphylia, where the Kings treature was ulually kept; atmird took their way to Thendoria; and the fourth to Argithea. But they all agreed upon this courfe to hold themselves quiet and peaceable at their first coming, and to converse in the market place of these Cities, as if they were come about some particular negotiation of their own and upon a certain day appointed to fet to it at once, and to raife the whole multitude for to expell the Macedonian garrifons out of their fortreffes. Now when the day was come, and Aminander ready upon the frontiers with his forces of a thousand Ætolians, the garrifons of the Macedonians were at one instant chased out of those four Cities aforesaid, like as it was complotted before hand and letters were dispatched from all parts into other Cities, advising them to deliver and free themselves from I. the tyranny of Philip, and reftore Aminander into his lawfull kingdome and throne of his father. Thus the Macedonians were expelled in every quarter : only the town Theiam made refiftance and held out tome few daies against the fiege, by occasion that Zeno (captain of the garrison there) had intercepted the letters, and they that fided with Philip were poffelled of the caltle. But in the and forrendred it was like wife unto Aminander, and all Athamania reduced unto his obedience excepting only the fort of Athenaum, fitu t upon the marches of Macedony.

Philip advertised of the revolt of Athamania, accompanie d with a power of fix thousand fighting men, put himself in his journy, and with exceeding expedition, marched as far as Gomabi. Where he left the greater part of his forces, (for they had not been able to endure io long a journey) and with two thousand came to Athenaum, the only place held by his garrison to his use. M And from thence, after he had founded the next neighbours, and foon found that there was nothing but holislity among them, he retired to Gomphi, and joined withall his forces togetherreturned into Athamania. Then he fent Zeno before with a thouland footmen, and gave him in charge to feize upon Athopia. a place that directly for his purpole commandeth Argithea; and feeing that his men were possessed thereof, himself fat him down, and pitched his tents about a certain temple dedicated to the name of Impiter. There he wasforced by reason of the fool and ftormy weather to flay one whole day, and the morrow after he went forward with his army to Argithea. As they marched, behold they discovered the Athamanians, running from divers parts to the hill tops, which flood over the way along. They had no sooner espied them, but the formost enfigns made stay, and all that regiment of the vanguard was surprised with fear and fright; Every man began for his part to call many doubts, and think with himfelf what should become of them, in case their companies were entred once into the vallier, so checked by those rocks abovefaid. This tumult and trouble caused the King perforce to call back those in the vanguard, and to retire the same way that he came, not withstanding he was very defirous (if they would have (econded him) to have made quick speed, and gotten through those streights. The Athamanians at first followed after them aloof quietly enough : but when they had once joined with the Etolians, leaving them behind to come upon the tail of the enemy, they forced themselves all about and flanked them on the fides : fome of them also got afore their head by the next water which they were acquainted with, and befet the pallages; infomuch, as the Macedonians were to greatly troubled, that forced they were (more like men that fied in difarray, then marched in good order) to leave much of their armor, and many of their men behind, to passe over the river; and there the chale ended. From thence the Macedonians returned fafely to Gomphi, and to forth into

The Athamanians and the Etolians affembled from all parts to Ethopia for to surprise and defeat Zeno and that regiment of a thousand Macedonians which was with him. But the Macedonians reposing no great trust in that place, retired from Ethopia, to an hill much higher and steeper

A treeper on all fides, and therefore leffe acceptable. The Athamanians having found out diverte partiages unto it, enforced them to forgo that holds lio. And when they were difperfed among the blind rocks, and unto them unknown, and could not readily find the way our, tome of them were taken pritoners, so others flain. Many for fear tumbled down headlong from the pitch of the cliffs, and brake their necks, and very few efcaped with Zeno to the King. The next day after they obtained truce, until they had committed their dead to earth.

tained truce, untill they had committed their dead to earth. Aminander having thus repossessed his realm, fent Embssadors to Rome unto the Senat alike wife unto the Sespices in Afia (who after the great battell with Antiochus, fojourned in Ephelis) He craved peace and pardon, he excused himself in that he had recovered his fathers Kingdome by the means and help of the Atolians, and withall laid great fault and blame upon King Philip. B As for the Æ olians, they departed out of Athamania, and made an expedition against the Amphilochians, and by confent of the greater part (reduced the whole nation under their pullance and subjection. Having thus regained Amphilothia (tor in times past it appertained to their siegnory) upon the ame hope they passed over in Aperantia, which yeelded also for a great part thereof. and came under their obedience. As for the Dolopians, they never belonged to the Etolians. but unto Philip. And at the first they affemoled together in arms, but understanding one that the Amphilochianstook part with the Etolians, that Philip was fled out of Athamanta and that his garrison was put to the sword, they revolted likewile from Policy, and surned to the Actolisms. Who making now full account that they were fore enough on all tides from the Macedonians, by realon of forman/ nations which environed them about, they took knowledge (by the common C brant) of the deteat of Antischus by the Romans in Affa, and not long after their own Empaffadors returned to Rome without hope of peace, relating withall that Fniv us the Conful had pailed the feas already with narmy. Upon these news, they were much troubled and afraid; and in this perplexity, they induced and procured first the Rhodian and then the Athenian Embassages, to the end that by the credit and countenance of these two States, their praiers lately rejected, might have more calle accelle to the Senat : and with them they lent to Rome once again the principall perfonage: of their nation, to try their last hope of obraining peace; and never to cast to prevent war, before the enemy was come welneer within their fight. Now had M. Fulvius transported his forces to Apollones, and devited with the princes and states of the Epirots, where to begin war, The Epirots advited him to affail Ambracia, which as then was united to the Actolians. And D why it either the Etolians should come to the defence of the place, they had a goodly large and open plain all about to bid them battel, or if they refuted the field, and would not fight, they should find no great diniculty to affault and force the town. For not only there was at hand ftore enough of simber and other matter to raile mounts, mantelets, and other fabricks; but Arethon a river navigable, very commodious to transport all necessaries unto them, runneth under the wals of the City; and befides, the lummer was a fit fealon for war-fervice. With their reasons they perfivade the Conful to conduct his army through Epiras. But when the Conful was come before Ambrac a ne found it was no easie prece of work to beliege and assault the town. This Ambravia is situat under the stony and craggy hill, which the inhabitants call Perantha. The City is feli looketh unto the Well, what way as the wall reacheth toward the fields and the river : the fore E and caftle thereof fandethupon the hill, and regardeth the East. The river Arethon running out of Acarnania, dischargeth it self into an arme of the sea, which beareth the name of the City neer adjoyning, and is called Ambracia. This town, besides that it is well guarded with the river of one fide, and defended with hils on the other, is fortified allo with a ftrong wall, in circuit fomwhat more then three miles about. Fulvius encamped strongly on the fields side, in two holds of a prety diffance alunder, and railed one sconce upon an high ground, opposit against the fortreis of the town. All these places he determined to enclose within the compais of a trench and rampier, to the end, that they who were that up within the town, might have no egrefs, and that from without there should be no ingress, for any aid and succour whatsoever. The Ætolians were assembled already at Straims by an edict from the Pretor Ninander, incontinently upon the rumour that ran Fthe fiege of Ambracia, intending fully at first to march from thence withall their forces. But afterwards, when they preceived that a greater part of the City was streightly beleaguered already, and blocked with trench and rampier; and withall, that the Epirots were encamped upon a plain on the other fide of the river, they were of advice to divide their forces in two parts. Expolemus accompanied with a regiment of a thousand men lightly appointed, passed through the fortifications of the enemies, before they were joined and united together, and entred Ambracia. Nicander with the rest of the forces purposed at the first by night to assail the camp of the Epitots, confidering that the Romans could not easily fuccour them, by reason of the river running bet ween. But afterwards upon better advite, imppoling this to be a dangerous enterprile (for fear left the Romans should discover their march, and so intercept them that they might not retire again in lafety ! he altered his mind, and turned to the spoiling and walting of Acarnania. Now when the Consul had made affend of all his tabricks devited for to invelt and enclose the City, and finishing his engins wherewith he meant to the skethe wall, he approached neer and gave affault in five places at once. Three batteries he planted in equal distance afunder, and where the callelt passage and access was from the plain, full upon that place of the City which they call Pyrrhaums one over against the temple of Ajoulapidus; and another opposit to the Castle With rams he thook the wals, with long poles and hooks he fetcht off and plucked down the

battlemens of the wals. The oppidans at the first were attaid to fee these strange engine, and H quaked to hear to terrible noise of their wals battered; but siter wards, seeing that the wals should upright beyond their expectation, they plucked up their hearts again, and with I wipes weighed cuber great counterpoites and weights of lead, or buge stones, then with a twing they tet them fall ag in upon the rams of the enemies, or else tumbled mighty big logs of timber aloft, and to either brake them apecces, or bare them down. And as for their hooks aforesaid, they caught hold of them with iron flouks like anchors, and to drew them over the wals to the other fide with a witness and brake both them & their poles, Moreover, they fallied out in the night upon the watch that at attended their engins, iffuedforth of themselves in the day time, alsailed the corps de guard. and put them great fear. As things frood in thele terms before Amhracia, the Atolians by this time were returned to Stratus from their rodes which they made into Acarnasia. And then Ni- 1 cander the Pretor conceiving some hope to levy the siege by some audacious and hardy adventure devised that one Nicadamus should put himself within the town of Ambracia wi h five hundred Ætolians; and appointed one certain night, and an hour allo of the tame night, when both they from out of the rown should assail the fabricks and engins of the enemy planted a sainst Prinhaum and also himself charge upon the camp of the Romans at the same time, and pur them in fright; Juppoling by this twofold alarm (especially in the night which maketh every thing more fearfull) there might be tome notable act and memorable exploit done. And Nicodamus verily for his part in the dead time of the night, having passed unfeen and not described by tome of the sentinels and by resolut force broken through the rest of the watches, passed over an arm of the river and recovered the City, and in some measure by this means heartned the befreged inhabitants to advenure K anything, and put them in better hope to accomplish al. And when the night appointed was come. all on a luddain he fet upon the engins, as it was before accorded between them. The adventure of this enterprite was much morethen the effect, because there were no forces without to joyn with him; were it that the Pretor of the Atolians was afraid to be to bold or that he thought it was a better peece of fervice to aid the Amphilochians newly recovered, whom Perfeus King Philip his ion, tene from his father to reconquer Dolopia and Amphilochia, affailed with great force and violence. The Romans had planted their ordnance and artillery, as is above faid in the eplaces against Pyrrheam, which the Ecolians charged all at one time, but nor with like preparation of means, nor with the same violence. For some came with burning and flaming firebrands, others carried tow and hards with pitch, and faggots of dry flicks, and other like matter cafe to be L kindled, in such fore as all their companies shone again with a light fire. Many of the warders they killed at the first onset, but when the sia m and tumult was heard within the camp, and the fign ! given by the Conful, they took arms, and ran apace out of all the gates for to releue and defend them. In one quarter the Ætolians did their deed, and fought with fire and fword but in the other two places after they had given the attempt, rather than began any skirmith, they retired and went their waies. The heat of the fight inclined wholly to one quarter, where the two captains Eupolemusand Nicodamus, encouraged their men as they fought from two divers parts, and enterteined them with an affored hope, that Nicas der according to agreement would be there and charge upon the back of the enemies. This for a good while mainteined the courages of the fouldiers : but perceiving there was no fign appeared of their countrymen, and that they kept not M touch with them, and teeing withall how the number of the enemies encreased, and themselves disappointed and destitute, they slaked their fight, and were not to eager upon the enemy, and in the end gave over and b ving much ado to retire in fafety, were challed into the City, after they had burnt tome of the Roman engins, and flain a few more of their enemies then there died of themselves. And lurely if the service had been followed in execution according as it was complotted and agreed, those devised engins no doubt might have been destroyed, if not wholly, yet in one part at least wite, and that with great murder and slaughter of the enemies. The Ambracians, together with those Etolians which were within the City, not only gave over that nights enterprise, but ever after shewed more coldness to b zard themselves again, as if they had N been betrayed by their own fellows. Not a man would fally forth upon the ward and watch of the enemies, but they all from their walls and turrets stood upon their guard only, and with the vantage of the place defended themselves in lafety.

Perfest advertised that the Actolians approached Amphilochia, quit the fiege of the City which he was about to affault: and after he had only harried and waited the territory about interired from those quarters and returned into Macadony. The Actolians likewise were enforced to depart from thence, by reaton that their sea-coalis were spouled and overtum: for Plannins the King of the Illyrians, was entred into this river of Corinth with a fleet of 60 barks, and with the fleet of the Achazu ships that lay in the rode of Parsa invested the maritim track of Acidia. Against whom were fent a thouland Ætolians, who waited upon the fleet at every turn as they doubled of any reaches, and with the vantage of the short waits and next passages by the land, were ready to welcome them on the banks and make head againft them.

The Romans lying thil in fiege before Anabracia, by bettering and shaking the wals in many places, had dismanted a great part of the City, and laid it open thouse they could not enter withit. For at every breach where the wall was broken down, they were ready to make a new countermure, and the soulders standing upon the very mins, served in stead of a bulwark. The Corful items he could not prevail by open since, determined to undermine and make a secret way in the ground into the City; but first he covered the place where they wrought with their lets. For a good while the pioners were not perceived by the themies, thou with flanding their wrought both night and day, mor only diggling under the earth, but also cathing up the mould as they were But anding the statch bearing up slots from the feet, was discovered, and gave them within the rown to understand, what the die fifics were about and feating left they had wrought fo far already as under their wals, and that they were at the point to make a way into the rown, they within began likewife to firike another trench just against the place covered with mantlets aforesaid: and when they had digged to that depth as the bottom might be of the enemies mine. they made no words within, but in great filence laid their ear too in divers places close to the earth. harkning if haply they might hear any molic of the pioners: and when they once had got B an ear of them, they countermined directly against them. And long they were not about it : for anon they came as far as to the void hollow ground, whereas the foundation of the wall flood mon flases and props, which the enemies had fet to bear it up. Now when their works were niet together, and that there was a continued passage out of this trench into the Mine, the proners first fell to it and scussed with their spades shovels, and mattocks, and such other tools that they had used to work withall: but soon after, armed souldiers entred and encountred within the vault, and closely skirmished under ground. But within a while that manner of dealing grew more rold and flack by reason that they stopped up the Mine between when they lift, one while with facks and haircloath, other whiles with doors and fach trash as they could come by in hafte & flood next hand. One new invention above the rest was devited against those within the Mine. C and the same but a slight matter, and made without any great trouble, and this it was, The towns men took a great tun or dryfat with a hole boared in the bottom, of that capacity, as might receive a pretty pipe like a faucet within it; and withall they made a pipe indeed of ironto fit it, and aniron lid likewife to cover the other end or mouth thereof, but the fame had many holes in divers places of it, Now this vesselled they stuffed full of down and fost seathers, and then set it with the head forward against the very Mine, From the lid or cover aforesaid there stood proking out long that p pikes, which the Macedonians call Sariffa, for to keep off the enemies. Within the feathers they put a cole or sparkloffire, and then with a pair of smiths bellows (the nose whereof went into the pipe aforefaid) they blowed the cole and fet it on a smothering fire within the feat thers. By which means there atole not only a mighty deal of smoak, but also it carried with it a n stinking favour, by the reason of the feathers burning within; and so filled all the Mine underneath, that fearce durit any man abide within for fear of being choaked.

During these affairs about Ambracia; Phaneas and Demoteles two Embassadors sent from the Exclians by a generall decree of the whole nation, came with a full and plenary commission unto the Comil. For their Prator (feeling of the one fide Ambracia befieged, and on the other fide the sea coast endamaged with the enemies ships, and in a third quarter the Amphilochians and all Dolopia piteously wasted by the Macedonians; and that the Ætolians were not able to oppose themselves and make head at once against three wars in divers parts) had affembled a general Diet for to confult with the chief of the Ætolians what was to be done in this case. All their opinions jumped in this one point," To feek for peace (if it were possible) under equal and indifferent "conditions: if not, yet in as tollerable terms as they might, in confidence and afforance (fay they) " of Amiochiu, the war begin: and now that Amiochiu is vanquished both by land and fea, yea, "and hunted as it were out of the compais of the world into an angle beyond Taurius, white "hoperemaineth to maintain and wage the war any longer? and therefore Phaness and Demote-"leswere to deal as in fach a case and time, as they thought best according to their wisdome and " fidelity and the common good of the Actohims for what other counfell remaineth, what course "elle canthey take, or what choice beside hath fortune lest them? To the suffice the Embedders said never a word, both forther they were very hard and grievous supervised; and silo because they knew the natures and minds of their countrimen and noise boam artifolds move analysis they were and that to be removed if they once took a pitch: Yyy wheremen whereupon they returned unto them, without doing any thing at all to know the advice once a- N gain of the Prator and the principal States, what to reloive upon in every respect, while all stood whole and upright. But they were welcomed with outcries, and well thent for their labouring that they had not dispatched and made an end, and so were sent away, and commanded to bring back with them one peace or other. As they went again toward Ambraein; they were foreland and turprized in an ambush laid for them near the high way side by the Acarnanians (with whom at that time they, warred land were had to Tyrrhoum and there imprisoned, And by this occasion the peace was delayed. Whiles the Embassadors of Athens and Rhodes (who were come already to intreat for them) remained with the Conful, Aminander also (the King of the Athamans) presented himself under * Ambrachia or fale conduct in the Roman camp, and took more care for the City of Ambracia (where he had r fo journed the greatest part of his exile Jthan in the behalf of the Etolians. By them, the Cof. was certified of the hard hap of the Ætolian Embassadors; and then he gave commandment, that they should be brought from Tyrrheum. When they were come, they began to treat of peace, Aminana der in the mean while laboured what he could in that enterprise which he especially had undertaken namely, to induce the Ambracians to submit unto the Romans: but when he saw he did but small good, for all his parling with the principal persons of the City from their walls: at length by the Cof, his permission he entred into the town; where, partly by good counsell, and partly by prayer and entreaty, he perswaded them in the end, to put themselves into the Romans hands. Now as touching the Etolians, they found much favour by the means of C. Valerins the ion of that Levinus, who first contracted amity with that nation; and was besides half brother unto the Co by the same mother. And the Ambracians after capitulation made, that the Etolians who came to aid them might go forth without harm, fet open their gates. Then a tilled it was with the Etolians: Imprimes, To pay 500 Euboik talents of filver; two hundred pretently, and the other 300 at fix paiments yearly by even-portions. Item, To render all Roman captives and fugitive traytors and runagates that they had into the hands of the Romans. Item, To challenge jurifdi-Rion over no City, which fince the time that T. Quintius passed over into Greece, was either forced by the Romans or entred voluntarily into amity and fociety with them: provided alwaies. that the Isle Cephalenia be not comprised within this capitulation. These articles, albeir they were somewhat easier than they looked for, yet the Ecolians requested, that they might acquaint their Council withall and permitted they were to to do Some finall variance and debate diffracted and L held them awhile as tou. hing those Cities, which having been in times past within their seignory and jurifdiction they hardly could abide to be difmembred (as it were) from their body. But in the end there was not one but agreed to accept of the peace. The Ambracians gave unto the Office appetent, a coroner of beaten gold, weighing 150 pound. Their flatues of brais and marble their painted tables (wherewith Ambracia was better flored and adorned, than all the other Cities of that region because it was the royall feat of King Pyrthus where he kept his court and refiance) were all taken down and carried away : nought else was touched nor any burt done belides.

The Conful dislodged then and removed from Ambracia into the higher and more inland Daris of Atolia, and encamped before the City called Argos Amphilochium, two and twenty miles distant ir m Ambracia: and thither at length repaired the Ætolian Embassadors unto him, M who marvelled much at them, why they staid to long. When he understood by them that thege nerall council of the Ætolians had approved of peace, he willed them to go directly to Romeunto the Senat : and permitted also the Athenians and Rhodians (their mediators and advocats) to go with them and as orators to fpeak in their behalfise moreover he granted that his half brother E.V. ilegius should accompany them: which otder when he had taken himself crossed over the water to Cephalenia.

When they were arrived at Rome, they found both the ears and hearts of the chief Senators wholly possessed beforehand, with many complaints and imputations that Philip had enformed against them: for he by means of his Embassador and letters (complaining that the Etolians had unjuftly taken from him the Dolapians, the Amphilochians, and Athamania; and that his gatri- N fons, yea, and last of all his ion Perfens, were driven out of Amphilochia, had wholly averted the Senat from giving any ear at all to their requests and prayers: howbeit the Rhodians & Athenians had andience given them with patien e and filence, "The Athenian Embaffador Leon (by report) "moved and periwaded the Senat with his eloquent tongue: and by a familiar parable and fimilia stude he compared the people of Litalia to the nature of the fea : For like as it, being of it felf of calm is troubled and made rough by the winds: even to (taith he) the people of that nation, all "the while they entertained riendship with the Romans, and performed their faithfull promise "unto them, to long were in their right kind, and continued peaceable and quiet: but after that or Theat and Dicearchin began to blow from our of Afrasa after that, Meneral and Damoeritue bluftred and puffed from the parts of Europe, then arole a florm and tempelt, with the gufts O " whereof driven they were to Antiochus, and caft (as a man would fay Aupona rock, Wellsthe &-"to iansafter they had been much toffed a long time from post to pillar, in fine effected, that these et articles of peace enfuing, were freely agreed upon. whereof at this present I will begin to write. This Conful in the beginning of the spring came to named Galatia

Ephelis; where, after he had received the army of L. Scipio, and taken a review and furvey thereof he made an Oration to his fouldiers; wherein, firthe praised their valour and vertue, in that with one battell they had finished the war against Animchure then he exhorted them to enter D into a new war with the Gauls who had fuccoured King Antiochus with aid; and were beside of nature fo untamed, that unless their puissance were abated and their courage taken down; to lisele or no purpole it was that Antiochus was removed beyond the mountains of Taurus, Last of all, some discourse he made of his own person, which was nothing prolix and long, implying neither vain untruths not exceffive reports. The fouldiers gave audience to the Conful with great joy and a general applaule, making this account, that fince King Antiochus was vanquished, the Gauls alone (who were one part of his forces) would be of no puffance to withfland them. But the Conful supposed that it was much out of his way, that Eumenes should be absent (for then he was at Rome) who knew the countries, was acquainted with the nature of the people, and whom it imported and concerned very much, that the power of the Gauls should be enseebled and abated. E And therefore he fent for Assalus his brother, from Pergamus, and exhorted him to enterinto 2-Ction with him and take arms. And when Arralus had made promile to aid him both in his person and with allthe power that he could make, besent him into his country to levy souldiers. After some sew daies, when the Consul was departed from Ephesus, Attalus (accompanied with a regiment of a thonfand foot and two hundred horse) met him at Magnesia; and had given order to his brother Athenaus, to follow after with the rest of the forces; having committed the guard and government of Pergamms and the kingdom to those, whom he knew to be fast and faithfull to hisbrother and himself. The Consul, after he had praised and commended the young gendeman marched forward with his whole power as far as * Maander, and there encamped, became it * Madre, was not possible to pais the river at any foord, and therefore boats and barges were to be got to-

F gether for to ferry and transport the army. When they were fet over the river, they went to Hiera Come, where there was a magnificent and stately Temple of Apollo, and an Oracle in it. And by report the Priests and Prophets there, deliver the sesponds and answers of the Oracle in verses, and those not rudely composed without rhithm & meeter. From hence they removed, and at two daies end arrived at the river Harpafur& thither were embassadors come from the Alabandians, requefling the Coffeither by vertue of his ambority, or by force of arms to compel one of their fortreffes which lately had revolted from them and rebelled, to return again to their former obedience. And bither Athenaus alfor brother to Eumenas and Attalus, was come together with Leufus the Candiot, and Corregue the Macedonian, bringing with them 1000 foot, and 300 horse, of divers nations mingled together. The Conful fent one of his martiall Tribunes or Colonels with a mean Company, to summon the Castile or fortressabovesaid and after it was forced and recovered, he delivered it inso the hands of the Alabandians. Himself kept on his direct way, and turned on no fide untill he came unto Amiochia upon the river Maandor, where he encamped. This river Ma-

But in process of time this old Celane was abandoned by the Inhabitants, and not far from it they peopled a new City called Apamea, beaning the name of Apames the fifter of Selencus, The river Marjus likewife fpringing nor far from

Whiles the Col lay encamped about Antiochia, Soleneus the ion of Antiochus, prefented himfelf unto him with corn for his army, according to the covenant contracted with Scipio, Some small variance and difference there was as touching the aid demanded of Antiochus: for Selencus pleaded that Antiochus had capitulated only to find corn for the Roman fouldiers. But this debate was foon at an end by reason of the (lift resolution of the Cos. who sent a Colonel to warn and charge the fouldiers to accept no corn before the aid-fouldiers of Antiochus were received. From t thence he marched to " Gorden tichos (a City to called) & 10 torward the third day to Taba. This City is feated upon the frontires of the Pindians, in that coast which boundeth upon the Pamphyliansea. This quarter was able to yield lusty men for war, when it had not been any way endamaged,but remained entire and whole. For proof whereof even then also there issued out of the City a corner of horimen, who charged upon the Romans as they marched, and at the first onset troubled them not a little. But afterward, feeing themselves neither for number, noryet for prowess comparable unto them, they were driven back into the town, & craved pardon for their trespals, ready to furrender their City into the Cof, his hands. The Cof, imposed upon them a paiment of 25 talents of filver, and 10000 medimns of wheat, and upon that composition their surrender was accepted. Three daies after the Romans came to Chaus the river & from thence to the City Eriza, R which at the first assault they won. After this the army marched as fat as to a Castle called Tha-" Hillad. Nigro. bullan flanding over the river " Indus, to called of acertain Indian, whom an Elephant threw and cast into it. Now they were not far from Cilyra, & yet no embassage appeared from the tyrant of that country and state, Magestes, a disloyal and treacherous man in all his dealings and befides, extream hard and unreasonable. Whereupon the Col sent out before C. Helviss, with 4000 foot and 500 horse to sound his disposition and mind. As these companies entred into histrontiers, there encountred them his Embassadors, giving them to understand that the tyrant their Master was ready to do what foever they would command: only his request was unto Helvim to pais peaceably through his country, and to restrain his souldiers from wasting & spoiling the territories, & Is talents they brought with them for to make a crown of gold. Helviss promised to save his L lands for being (poiled and wasted, but he willed the embassadors to go to the Cos. Now when they had related the same unto him, he made them answer in these terms, We cannot gather by any fign(qd,he)that the tyrant beareth good will and affection to us Romans : & again if he be fuch an one as the world taketh him for we are to think rather of his chastisement, than of admitting him into our amity. The embafiadors fore troubled at this word, requested him for that present no more, but to take the crown of gold, and to permit that the tyrant himself might have access into his presence for to parl with him and clear himself. The morrow after, by permission of the Cof came the tyrant into the camp bearing no port of a Prince For a privat person and mean man of small wealth would have gone in better apparel, and carried a greater train about him than he neither went he fo meanly but he spake as lowly, hacking and hewing his words as if he had not M been able to speak them out He complained of his own bareness and want & likewise of the poverty of the Cities under his seignory (for besides Cybira he held in possession Sylium & that which is called Alimne) Yet he promited to fee what he could do if haply by undoing himfest & spoiling his subjects he might make up five and twenty talents, Mary he mistrusted greatly that he should never effect io much. Are you thereabout? (qd, the Coi.) Now verily I can no longer endure this mockery. Was it not enough that in your abience you bashed not to delude and disappoint us by your Embassadors, but you must persist still in the same impudency now that you be here yourself in person? And would you make us beleeve indeed, that the disburing of 25 talents will begget you and your whole kingdom? Come on fir, I fay; Bring me hither within these three daies, and lay me down in ready money 500 talents, or look for no other favour, but your territory to be N wasted, and your City besieged. Greatly affrighted was he at these minatory words, howbeit he continued fill obstinatly, counterfeiting & pretending his neediness and poverty, and aftermuch base hucking, and rising by little and little, one while hasting and wrangling, another while praying and entreating (and that with whining and putting finger in the eye) he was fetcht over at length and came off to pay 100 talents of filver, and to deliver 10000 medimns of corn befides. And all this was exacted of him to be performed in fix daies. From Cibyra the Cof, conducted the army through the country of the Sindenfians, and after he had passed over the river Calauris, hethere pirched down his tents. The morrow after they marched by the lake or mear Caralita; and fet them down and rested upon the river Maander. As they advanced from thence toward Lagon the next City the inhabitants fled for fear: wherupon the town void of people, but replenished with O abundance of all things was ranfacked and rifled. This done, they arrived at the head or foring of the river Lyons, and the next day marched toward the river Cobulatus. The Termissians at the same time having forced and won the City of the Lyrians, were now upon the point to affault the Castle. They who were within besieged, seeing no other hope of succour, sent their Embassadors to the Conful, befeeching his help, and making pitifull moan, how they with their wives and children were shut up within the fortress, and looked every hourstor death, either by faminor the

To Termell who granted percempon composition that he should receive first 30 talents. In like fort he dealt by the Alpendian and other Stases of Pamphylin. In his return from thence, the first day he encamped fast by a giver alled Taurus, and the pext day dollowing, near a rown which they call Xyline-Come, From whence he marched and held on his journey continually, until he came to the City Cormal. The next City unto it was Darfa, which he found abandoned by the Inhabitants for fear howbeit, full of all kind of goods. As he marched fill along the marches there met him Embassadors from Lyfinia, who came to render their City into his hands. Atterthis, he entred into the territory of Sagalaff u, a fertile & plenteous quarter, for all forts of corn & truits. The Pifidians in-R habit those parts, who are the best warriors in all that country. In regard whereof, as also for that their ter: itory is fruitfull and well peopled, and their City strongly atuat (as few like unto it) they were grown to be hardy and couragious. The Coffeeing no embaffage prefented unto him in the entrance of the frontiers, fent outfortagers to fetch in booties. When they perceived once their goods harried and arried away before their faces, their flomacks came down, and then they fent their emballado, s. and upon composition to pay 50 talents, 2000 medimns of wheat, and as many of bar ey, they obtained peace. From thence he passed to the sountains of Obrama, untill he came to a village which they name Aporidon Come, and there he encamped. Thither repaired the pext day Seleuciu from Apimea. And the lame day, after he had lent away unto Apamea his fick folk and other biggage and pelf that he had (good for nothing) he took guides of Seleucusfor the C way, and entred into the plains of Metropolis, and the mext morrow marched as far as Dinigin Phyggia. After this he entred into Synada, where he found all the towns about abandoned for fear, and left detert. With the booty and pillage whereof his army was to heavily charged; that hardly he could march five miles a day; and so he came at length to Bendot, named, The old, From thence he passed to Anabura and the next day to the source of Alander, and the third day pitched down his tents near Ab. fiss. There he lay encamped many daies together, because he was now arrived into the country of the Toliftobogians.

The Gauss in times past being a mighty people in number, were induced to take a voyage, either for want of land to inhabit, or for hope of booty and prizes: and supposing withall, that they could not pass through any nation whatsoever, comparable to themselves inseats of arms, encited In under the conduct of Brennus into the country of the Dardanians, Where, they began to mutice among themselves: by occasion whereof it happed, that so the number of twenty thousand of them, following two of their Princes Lamnorius and Lutarius, departed from Brennus, and took their way into Thracia: where partly by warring with them that made relifiance, and partly by intpoling tribute upon them that craved peace, they came at length as for as to Bizantiam: and after they had held tributary a good time the coalt of * Propantio, they possessed themselves also of the * Mer di Mer good towns and Cities of that quarter; After this they had a mind and defire to invade Affa ; for mus, they heard lay, being to near, how fertile and plenteous the foil of that country was. And after they had insprized and won Lysimachia by a wile, and by force of arms conquered all Chersonnefur, they descended to Hellespent. Where seeing how they were divided from A stabut only by the E firsights, and that it was but a small out thicher, their define was much more inflamed to passover.

And for this nurpole they dispatched certain curriers to Antiputor the governous of that coall to demand paffage. But by scalouchat they effected not this to formas they hoped there grole and ther pery ledition between the Princes themselves Whereupon Lomnorius accompanied with the gremer part tetired to Byzantium from whence he came, Birt Lutarius took from the Macedonions (who mider colour of an embaffage were sent from Amigueer in cipiali) two covered thips; and three brigandines. By means of these vessels, within sew states he had set over all his arm transpossing them one after another day and night continually after long after Lonnorius alfo pa sed outriges & fa trom Bezantium, by the aid of Nicamedes Kings of Biehynia. The bruit of their name was to fearfull and terribles and offeet a ly after their aftire was authiplied and increased in great number that the KK allo of Knisi in the end selinfed not to benheir homagers and give them enhance. The first of all the subabitants in A Caohat denied them homage, was King Astalus the father of Eumenes: and descence he wood the expectation of all mens, favoured his hardy and copragious enterprise : for he canquished them in barrell. Howbeit, He danced nor their hearts so much, bussfill they upheld and maintained their foveraign leignory, in such fort, as their puissance continued untill the war H between Antiochus and the Romans, Yea, and after that Antiochus was vanquished and chased out of part of his Realm, they conceived great hope to hold their own fill; by reason they were to remote from the lea, and therefore thought that the Roman army would never pierce fo faras to them. The Confulnow, for as much as he was to war with this milion, to terrible to all their neighbours in those quarters, assembled his souldiers to a publike audience, and in this manner made speech unto them. " Lam not ignorant, my fouldiers, that of all the people which inhabit Afa, the Gauls are most " renowned for valiance in war. And why? this fierce and cruell nation having run over the world in a manner and warred with all countries, chose them a place of abode, and to settle themselves in the midft of a generation, of all other most mild and tractable. Yet this one good " turn ye shall have that as against you they have not that courage which in times past they had; se to among the Greeks here, they are of as great name as ever they were in ancient time. So that " among tryour allies, you shall win as great honour by your victory, as if you should have conoue. er red the Gauls, when they were at the height of their valour and prowels, After the affembly difmissed, and Embassadors sent to Epossog and (the only Prince in those parts who persisted in amito with Eumenes, and had refused to aid Antiochus against the Romans) the Cof. marched forward. The first day he came to the river Alander, and the morrow to a certain village which they B call Tyfcon, I hither repaired unto him the Embaffadors of the Oroadians, craving to be accepted as friends; but they were enjoyned to pay two hundred talents: nd when they requested leave to make relation and report hereof at home they were permitted. From thence the Cof. led his army to Pluendam; and after that he encamped at Alyartos. Thirther returned they who had been fent to Epossognatus together with the Embassidors of Prince Compulsus requesting the Romans not to was upon the Tectolages; for that both himself and Epoffognatus allo, would go in person to them and perswaded the nation to do whatsoever they should be commanded. The Prince obtained his request; and so from thence the army began to march through the land which they call. Axylor: and well it might be so called, for it hath no wood at all in it, nor beareth so much . Woodless as thorns, or any thing elle to burn and maintain fire: cow-dung is all their burning, for want of Cotherfeweil, Whiles the Romans lay in camp before Cuballum, (a fortress of Gallogracia) they disovered the Cavalry of the enemies coming toward them with a great hurrey and tumult: and they the reed to fiercely and fundenly upon the corps de guard of the Romans, that they not only troubled and ditordered them, but also killed some of them. The alarm being given within the camp the Roman horsemen at once issued forth of all the gates, discomfitted the Gauls, and flew certain of them in the chase. The Contul perceiving now that he was come into his enemies country, marched not from thenceforth without lending out his espials before and kept his army together in battel array with great heed and carefulness. Thus he held on his journey continually until the came to the river Sangarius, where he purposed to make a bridge, because there was not passage over at any foord. This Sangarius arrileth out of the mountain Adoreus, and running D through Phrygia it joyneth with the river Thymbris near unto Bithynia, and to growing bigger by receiving a double current keepeth his course through Bithmia, and dischargeth himself into Propontes : a river not lofamous and noble for the greatness thereof, as because it vieldeth fish abundantly to all the nations bordering and dwelling thereupon. When the bridge was finished and the army passed over, as they marched along the bank side, the Galli or Priests of Cybele (the great mother of the gods) were come from Peffinus, and with streamers, infules, and other ornaments mer them: and in their fanaticall verses (as men distracted of their wits) seemed to prophese and foretes, that the goddels wouch safed the Romans a fair way to war and victory, yea. and the conquest and seignory of that country. Hereat the Consul faid. That he accepted their words for a pretage of good fortune, and the reupon in that very place he pitched his Tenris. The e next day he went as far as Gordum: a town verily it is none of the greateft, but more frequented and reforced unto for traffique and merchandife, then usually such dry towns are that stand far within the land. Three feas there be triangle-wile of equall distance all from it. On the coast toward Sinope, it harh Helleffont and the thores of the other tract, whereas the Cicilians inhabit by the fea-fide. Moreover, it borderers upon the confines of many great nations, who for their mutuall need and commodity, have commettee of negotiation, and meet together in that one place... This town at that time they found altogether dispeopled, by reason that the inhabitants weite fled to tear; but well flored, and full of wares and goods of all forts. Whiles the Romans lay there excamped, there came Embaffadors from Epoffognatus, reporting unto them, that he had made a journey to the Princes of the Gauls, but could obtain no reason at their hands! also H that they were dislodged out of the champain country; had quit their villages and lands ingreat muntersyrand together with their wives and children drave before them and carried with them whatibever they could and were retired to to the mount Olympus, from whence they purpoled to defend them elves by force of arms and the firong fituation of the place. The Emballadours likewife withe Oros adians, gave more certain intelligenae, to wit, That the whole people in generall offiche Toliftobogians had feized the hill Olympus; that the Tectolages feverally by themselves that taken another mountain called Magana; that the Trocmians, had committed their wives and children to the guard of the Tectofages, minding with a main army to aid the Toillohogians: Now ar that time she Princes of those three States were Orgingo. Combatomiarate and Caulotae. And the principall reason and means that these had to enterprise war. G was this; That being possessed of the highest hills of that country, and having brought thither provision of all things to ferverthem for a long space, they supposed to weary and wear ountheirenomies in proveis of time. For this account they made, that they would never venture to merch against them, through so hard, so difficult land disadvant socous places; and if they affaied to no dout they might be empeached, repulled back and bearendown with a small company: again, if they would fit fill in leaguer at the foor of those frozen mountains and do nothing; they were neverable to endure the cold and the fearcity which they should find there.

And not withflanding the very attitude and height of the places defended them, yet over and beat fides they caft a trench, and made other defences round about the cops with mountains which they held. Also for provision of darts and other thot, it was the least of all their care, inprofine that the rough places would furnish them with Justicient flore of stones to fling. The Conful forecalling in his mind that he should not deal with these enemies close at hand-right, but a lar of when he was to sifail their holds, had made provinon aforehand of great flore of darts, light relitary lavelins, arrows, bullets of lead, and imall fromes that might be levelled and tent out of fines. Thus being well appointed and furnished with such kind of shot, he led his army toward the mountain Olympus, and about five miles off he encamped. The next day he together with Attalya ad an ed forward with 500 men of arms to view the nature and standing of the mountain, together with the fituation of the Gauls camp. But the enemies horiemen being double in number to y them, issued out of their camp, and put them to flight, slew a few of them in the rout, and hurt many. The third day he fet forward with all his forces to discover the places, and by reason that there came not one of them out of their defences and fortifications, he rode round about the monntain in lafety at his pleasure, and perceived that on the South-side, there were certain little hills. all of of clean earth without flones, and the tame riting up with an eatie afcent to a certain place; but to the North were high rocks, and the same in manner steep upright. And whereas as the rest were inaccessible three only waies and advenues he found, the one directly toward the midn of the mountain (where those little mounts of earth (tood) the other two were difficult the one lying Southeast, and the other Northwest. After he had comidered and viewed these places that day he pitched his camp at the very root and foot of the hill. The morrow after he facrified, and w finding by the first beasts which he killed that the gods were pacified and favourable unto him he divided his army into three battaillons, and so advanced against the enemy, and himself in person with the greatest part of his forces, mounted up the hill, whereas it yielded the easiest as ent. He commanded his brother L. Marlius, from the Southwell to get up the hill, as the place would permit with fafety, giving him in charge that i he met with any dangerous places (teep and hard of alcent, that he should not wrettle with the diffi ulties of the ground, nor strive against those things, which to for e and overcome were unpossible; but rather to traverie the ground, and retire toward him, and fo to joyn with his battaillon. As for C. Helvius, he willed him with a third part of the forces to wheel about by little and little, and fetch a compais at the hill foot and then from the Northwest to mount up Likewise the aids of Asselus, he divided into three equal parts. I. and took order that the young Prince himself in person should keep with him. The Cavalry and the Elephants he left in the next downs beneath the hills, and charged the Captains thereoi to have a carefulleye and good regard to mark what was done in every place, yea and to make hafte to refere and incour wherefoever need should be. The Gauls making full re koning that on two fides they were fure enough, and the place that way to be inacceffible; becau e they would thop the other advenue by force of arms on the South fide, fept forth about four thousand armed men to feize upon a certain hill within a mile of their camp; which hill commanded the way, suppofing there, as from a konce and toxtrels to debar them of passage. Which when the Romans perceived they put themielves inteadines to fight. A pretty pace before the entigns, marched the skitmilhers, together with the Candiot archers and flinggrs from Attalas; likewife the Triballi- M ans of Thrace. The emigns of the tootmen tollowed lettry after (as well as they might) against the hill, bearing their targets before them for as they feemed to cover themselves only to avoid the that and meant not to enter into any fight hand to hand. The fight at first was equally performed with thot a good distance off tor as the Gauls got the advantage of the ground, so the Romans had the odds for variety and Rore of darts. But as the skirmish continued and encreased, there was no more equality icen. For the shields of the Gauls being made long, and not broad enough for their bodies, and withall flat and plain without, hardly covered and defended them: and by this time all their shot was spent; & weapon had they mone but their very swords, whereof them was no use at all considering the enemy came not to close fight. The only help they had was with fiones, and those too big for their handling, and not cafe to weild by reason they were not pro- N vided before, but luch as in that hafte came next to their hand without any choice, Moreover, ber ing not pled and exercised to flinging, they had neithbrithe artificial fleight, nor yet sufficient fireneratio help themselves withall; but contrariwise, from all parts were pelted with bullers of lead and galled with arrows & dares at unawares which they could neither ward nor avoidsand for that with anger & fear together their with & understandings were blinded, they wist not what to do feeing themselves susprised and overtaken in a kind of fight whereunto they were least of all fitted For as in close conflict hand to hand, where blows are dealt, where raps are given and taken enterchangeably, chaler kindleth courage even to when men are wounded aloof with light darts; Sefrom whence theyknow not they wor not upon whom to run Seat whom to make in that blind fit of theirs but they men upon their own fellows without all reason at a venture like wild beafts O galled with arrows flicking in their fides. Now, they receive not a wound but it is feen by reason that they fight maked, and their bodies are fai effick and white, as being never hare burin battells by which means, greecer flore of bloud guilt out of the wounds in their flethy bodies, the gas thes appear greater and their white skin much more flained with black bloud. But they pais not to much for broad & wide flather (for otherwhiles when the skin is ont away & the wound rather broad than deep they take more pride therein, & think they fight with greater honor. Mary it is

A happen at any time, that an arrow head or a bullet ticking within the flesh all hidden, put them en pain and torment, notwithtranding the hurt be imailtin appearance, yet when they feek to pluck ont an arrow, and the head will not fo low, then they take on and are flark mad, for fhamethat fo small a prick should plague them so and be ready to kill them intomuch as they cast themselves on the ground, and lie wallowing along every where. Others there be of them that ran full moon their enemy, and those were sticked with arrows and darts from all parts. & when they came near to hand, were by the skirmishers killed and cut in pieces with their swords. These souldiers nie to cover themselves with a shield of three foot long, carrying in their right hand certain spears to nie aloof, and wear by their fide a Spanish sword, Now in cale they come to hand fight, they shift their fpear out of their right hand into the left, and take them to their fwords. By this time there were R but few of the Gauls left alive; who perceiving that the light armed skirmishers of the enemies were too good for them & feeing withall the enfigns of the legions to approach near unto them. took them to their heels on all hands, and began to flie amain toward the camp; which now was full of fear and trouble, as where women and children and a multitude of feeble folk (not fir to bear arms) were crowded and thronged together. The Romans following the train of their victory feized the hils abandoned by the enemies that were fled, About the same time L. Montim and C. Helvim, having mounted to far as they could find way, traverfing the fides of the hill. when they were come to an end, where they could fee neither way nor path, they turned to that quarter of the hill which only afforded a way, and both of them began to follow the Confuls battaillon, a pretty diftance alunder, as if they had agreed beforehand to to do : and that which at first Chad been simply the best thing to be done, they were of necessity forced at last to put in execution, For in such difficulties and places of disadvantage, succours behind in a rereward, have oftentimes served in right good stead: that if those in the vanguard should chance to be beaten back. they in the second place might receive and protect them, and also begin freshly a new fight. A ter that the formost engos of the legions were come to those bills; which the light armed before had seized, the Consul-commanded the souldiers to rest them awhile and breath themselves, and shewed them withall where the bodies of the Gauls lay dead along all overthe mountains. And if (qd, he) the light agened skirmishers have made such a riddance of them, what is to be looked for at the hands of the legionary fouldiers, aimed all over in compleat harnels? What will they do that carry the hearts of most noble warriogs ? Surely they must needs win the camp, into which n the enemy is chafed and driven by the light armed fouldiers. Howbeir he commanded the light armed to go afore, who all the while that the legions seded themselves spent not the time in vainbut emploied it in gathering together, she datts and javeling that lay about the hills; to the end that they might have inflicient shot. Now the Romansmarched forward and approached the camp. The Gauls likewise for their parts fearing left their defences would not be able to defand them. Rood armed before their trench and sampier. But afterwards being overcharged with all fores of darrs, they were driven in the turning of an hand within their hold; (for the more they were in number and the thicker they flood, the less lighted any dart in vain only they lest from guards about the gates and entrance into the camp. Moreover, among the multitude which was driven into the hold, there was discharged at random a mighty number of dates : and that many of E them were hart thereby, appeared by their cry mingled with the Thrikes of women and children. Now, against them that warded the gates, and took up the avenues with their guards abe legionary fouldiers in the forefront let flie their javeling. And albeir their were not wounded in their bodies, yet by reasonshat their thields & bucklers were pierced through, they were most of them entangked one within another, and fluck fast Long they could not abide the violence of the Romans, infomuch as before that the victors could enter into the camp, the Gauls fled forth at all the gates wide open, and ran they will not whither like blind men, as well through places which had no way as those that were passable. No rocks so steep with downfals, no cliffs to rough with crags could hand in their was and nothing feared they affront ; their enemies only at their heels affrighted them. And therefore most of them either fell headlong down a mighty height and brake F their necks, or elle fonvery feeblenels, folt their breath, were windless, and ready to die. The Cof. after he had taken their camp, would not suffer it to be ransacked, but commanded the souldieracvery one to follow the chale hard; and whiles the enemies were thus affraid, to affright them throughly, Then came the other regiment with L. Manlim, but the Corfel would not fuffer them to enterthe camp, but fent them forthwith to putite the enemies. Himfelf also in perforanon afterfollowed, when he had delivered stocharge of keeping the prifoners, unto the military Tribunes of the army: for this reckoning and resolution he made, that the war was at a finall end, if in this sumultious fright of theirs he might either kill or take prifoners a number of them. The Could was no conce departed, but Cittalous came with his third regiment, but he could not hold his fruidier of ont-the pillage of the camp, infomuch as the boory and prizes were mon unin the case among them who were at so end of the skirmish. The Cavairy stood all this while fill and with not without or that their fellows had gotten the victory: but afterwards they alto enjung the Gails, disperied about the root of the mountains, made after them as well as their horses would mount against the hills: some they slew, and others they took prisoners. The just number of those that were slain cannot easily be counted, because they sled far and near among the cranks and windings of the mountains, where they were killed in blind corners. meand tumbled down into the vallies of a mouthrous depth underseath; Yes, and form has and no be beiled in the woods amidft the thickers & bufhes , Clanding, who written of two breeks to bette mobine mount Olympus, reporteth that there died there forty thousand enemies. "But Valerite Adrian who otherwise is wone to overreach and exceed in number bath recorded not above tel thousand. But without all question the priloners amounted to forty thousand fully because the wenewith a train of all forts and ages, more like mondifledging and semoving out of one counery unto another, than going to war. The Conful and he had burned at the armour of his enemies in one heap, commanded his fouldiers to bring forth the reft of the pillage and fpoil into one place, and either fold and made money of that which was to come into the publike treatury of the City, or elle parted it amongh the fouldiers indifferently, with great regard, that every one should have a just and even portion, Moreover, he commanded them all in open andience; and rewarded every one befides with gifts according to their feveral deferts. But above the refer and with the general accord of all he both praised, and also recompensed Astalus. For furely that you gentleman shewed not only ingular valour and forwardness in all travels and dangers, but also speciall modesty and rare sobriety.

There remained yet entire and whole the war with the Techolages, against whom the Conful made an expedition, & upon the third day arrived at Anorma noble City in those paristiron whence the enemies were little more than ten miles distant. During the time that he lay there encamped there hapned a memorable act, performed by a captive Lady. Among many more prifeners there fortuned to be kept in ward, the wife of Ortugon, a woman of surpaffing beauty. The Centurion who had her person in safe custody, was lecherous and goverous withall; as many of k the'e fouldiers are. Her he follicited and tempted fielt to commit folly : but feeing her altogether unwilling; and that the abhorred to profitute her felf unto him, he did violence uponthat body of hers, which fortune had made bond and thrall unto him. But afterwards to mollifie and after iwage the indignity of this villany, he put the woman in good hope, and promised that the should return home again to her friends: mary he would not do all for pure love alone and freely withour ranfom, for he bargained to have a certain fum of gold befides. And to the end for footh that no person belonging to him might take knowledge thereof, the permitted her to send one of the priloners whom the would her felf as mellenger to her friends and kintfolk, and appointed a place near unto a river, whither the next night following (hould repair two and no more fofthe faid captive Ladies friends, with the gold above aid) for to receive her at his hands. It felt one fo L that among the reft of the captives committed to his ghard, there was a bondflave of herown; this messenger at the shatting in of the evening the Centurion conducted without the torn de guard. The morrow night after came accordingly to the place appointed both the two friends aforefaid of the gentlewoman, and also the Centurion himself with his priloner, where they shewed the gold, amounting to the full fum of one Attick talent (according as it was agreed between them land with that the woman spake unto them in her language and commanded them to draw their lwords, and kill outright the Centurion as he was weighing the gold. Which done, the caused his head to be fricken off, and wrapped it her self within her gaterent, and so carried it home to her husband Orriagon, who from Olympus had fled and escaped to his own house. But before that the clipped and embraced her husband, the threw down the Centurion his head at M his feet. And when he wondred what mans head it was, and what act this might he far paffing a womans deed, the contested to her husband the injust that her body Itad suffered, and likewise the revenge for the abuse of her chastity by force and violence and (as it is reported) His maintained the honour of this matronlike act ever after even to her dying day, in all fanctimony of Me and modest carriage of herself like a chaste dame. TE NO LEA

Whiles the camp lay at Ancyra, the Orators of the Techologes shewed themselves unto the Conful, requesting him not to dislodge and remove from thence before he had parted with their Lords and Princes: faving withall, that they would accept any conditions of peace what foever, rathershan war. The time was let down, even the next morrow, and a place likewise appointed, as just in the mid way (as it could be guessed) between the camp and Anorra. The Cost thinket came in at the hour assigned, accompanied with a guard of five hundred horse that perceiving no Gaulat all there he returned into the camp. And thither repaired the same Oracors anto him the second sime, excusing the default, and saying that their Princes could not come in person by occasion of some scruple of conscience that arose the while; howbeit, the chiefpersonages bender on the whole nation should appear, by whom all matters might be composed as well as with themselved, The Conful made answer, that he likewise would send Arealm in his stead. So they came to this emparling from both parts. Attalia had three hundred men of arms about him for his grand and certain conditions of peace were drawn and propounded but foramuch as they might not grow to any finall conclusion in the absence of their chief Commanders, accorded it was that the day following the Conful and their Princes aforefaid frontd meet in that place together. How the o drift of the Gauls in making these delaies and triffing off the time, was this, that fiff they might gain some convenient space to trampert over the river Holys all that ever they had (which they would not hazard with their ownperions, together with their wives and children) and afterwards to lay a train of an ambush for the Consol himself, who cook small regard, and was not provided for to prevent their villary intended under the colour of that conference. For that purpole, they choic a thouland horismen out of all their cavalry, of especiall valous and approved hardi-complotted. Certain fouldiers of the Romans tent out to purvey forrage and fewel, were directed to thole very quarters whereas the parly abovefaid should be kept. The Colonels thought it the furer place for them, because they were to have the Copius guard also opposed for their desence against the enemy : howbeit, they fet another corps de guard of their own, confissing of coo horfmen nearer to the camp. Now by reason that Attalus afforted the Conful fo certainly, that their Princes would come, and that the matter might be foon knit up and dispatched, he departed out of the camp with the same guard of hortemen as before, and when he had marched almost five miles forward, and was not far short of the place appointed, he discovered all of a sudden the B Gauls riding in full galloo against them in most furious manner as enemies; wherupon he staid the march and made a stand: commanding the horsemen to make ready their weapons and resolve to fight. The first charge and shock he received right valiantly, and stepped not back one soot: but afterwards, as the multitude preffed fill upon him, he began to give ground and retreat, but so as he brake not the ranks of his troops. But in the end, when they found more danger in longer flay, than commodity and help in keeping their arraies, they all at once turned their horie heads and fled. When they were difarrated once, the Gauls purited hard and killed them: and no doubt a great part of them had died for it, but that the forragers guard of 600 horse aforesaid came in to rescue them. For they hearing afar off the searful cry of their sellows, made ready their armor and hories, and being fresh & in heart, entred upon the fight that was given over by their weatied and C discomfited companions: whereupon fortune quickly changed, and the fear turned from the lofers to the winners; for at the first encounter the Gauls were put to flight: and withall, the faid forragers and fewellers came running out of the fields, and from all parts made head and affronted the Gauls; infomnch as they could neither flie readily nor escape furely, became the Romans with their fresh hories followed them in chaie, and they themselves were alreadyrized: few therefore: wentaway with life, and not one was taken pritoner, for the greater part by ode paid dearly by the lois of their lives, for violating of this their parly under the colour of truth and fidelity. The Romans whiles their flomacks were inflamed with anger, the very next day came against them with the puissance of all their forces. But the Cos, employed two whole daies himself in viewing and discovering the situation and nature of the hill because he would not be ignorant of anything re-

n. quifit. Upon the third day after he had first taken the anspices and presages of the birds, and afterwards killed a facrifice, he led forth his army divided into 4 battaillons. Two of them were to mount up the midft of the hill & the other two he let in the fides to flank the wings of the Gault. and to march up against them. The Tectolages and Troomions, who were the whole flower and firength of the enemies, made their main battel in the midft, confifting of 50000 men; and because there was no use of horse among those rough & uneven rocks, the cavalry alight on foot to the number of 10000, and those they put in the right wing. The Cappadocians with Ariarates, & the auxiliary Morzians, who arole to the number almost of 4000 men, held the left. The Cof, (like as before in the mount Olympus) marshalled his light armed for skirmish in the forestront of the vangard,& gave order to have ready at hand as great flore of darts & other shor of all forts as he had E before. When they approached one another, all things answered both of the one fide & the others like as in the former conflicts laving that the courage of the victors increased in regard of their fortunat success, & the hearts of the enemies were much abated and danted. For albeit themselves had not yet been soiled & vaquished, yet they took the overthrow & loss of their countrimen for their own. And therefore as the beginning of the battell was (utable) to the iffue was likewise. For the Gauls battell was overspread & covered again as it were with a cloud of lightshot. And not one of them durff run forth out of his range, for fear he should discover his whole body & lay it open to take all that came : and keeping fill together as they did, the thicker they flood, the fairer mark they were for the enemies to level at, & the more wounds they received. The Cof, perceiving the were already of themselves troubled, and supposing that if he set forward & presented unto them F the enfigns of the legions, they would immediatly all of them flie, received the light armed loofe thor, & the rest of the auxiliary souldiers within his own ranks and files, and then advanced his legions. The Gauls affrighted with the fresh remembrance of the late defeat and overthrow of the Toliflobogians, carrying also about themselves the darrs flicking in their bodies, weary besides with long flanding afoot, and overcharged likewife with many, a wound, could not abide fo much as the onfer and shout of the Roman legions. Then began, they to take their heels and flie toward their camp, but few of them recovered it, and got within the rampier and other defences.

The greater number fled here and there on both hands, and differfed shemfelves into all parts as it took them in the head, and as every man in this confused fright caughe a way by himself. The Conquerors followed them ftill even hard to the very camp, and all the way charged upon their 6 backs and best, them down. Which done, they fluid and fluckfill in the campior defire of pillage and there was not one sharfollowed one foot after. The Ganls in the wings flood to it longer, by reacon that it was later creabey were fee upon but able they were not to abide the first charge and those the Roman dates. The Confel, who could not politibly pinck those our of the camp that were once entred in for greedings of spoiling and rithing sharems, seneous those immediatly that were in the wange to follow the enemies in chafefull forward. The le purinted shem a certain face: howbein in this flight (for in truth it was no fight at all there were not above eight thoufand than left their carcaffes behind them, all the reft recovered the orlier fide of the fiver Hally. Manual the Romans semained that night within the enemies camp; the reft the Confid bringht back spain to his own. The next day he took account and furvey of the prifoners and prices. which was to great as a man would conceive that a nation of all others most greedy of pillips and fooiling might pollibly rake and heap together for fo many years, as they held all those pairs within the mountain Tauracty force of arms. The Gauls thus featered inflight, rallied themselves in to one place, as being many of them hurt or difarmed, and tripped clean out of all they had tent their Embaffadors unto the Conful to treat for peace. The Conful willed them to give attendance upon him at Ephafus: himfell made halte to remove out of those cold quarters, by realon that the mountain Taurus was fo near (for now it was the midft of Autumn) and led back his victorious army to pais the winter near the featide.

Whiles the affairs thus passed in Afin, all was quiet in the rest of the Provinces. At Romethe Censors T. Quintin Flamininus and M. Claudiu Marcellus made a new choice of Senators; and P. Scipio Africanas was chosen the President of the Senat now the third time: four only were left out and discarded; but not one of them had born office of State, and had the honour to fit in the Curule chair. The Cenfors shewed themselves likewise pessing mid in the review of the Cavalry and order of Knighthood. They put out to framing the foundations and ground works upon the Aguimelium in the Capitoll: and likewise they bargained for to pave the street with hard fline or pebble from the gate Capena to the Temple of Mars. The Campans demanded of the Senat. in what place they should be assessed and enrolled: and thereupon a decree passed for their enrolment at Rome. The rivers were out, and great deluges hapned that year. The Tyber overflowed w

Copiul M. Fulvian having utterly subdued the Acolians passed over into Cephalenia; and sent to all the Cities about the Island certain messengers, to found them whether they would rather yield themselves unto the Romans, or hazard the fortune of war? And so for the was fear among them all that there was not one person refused to surrender. And being enjoyned (according to the ability of the people who were but bare) to give hoftages, the Nefiores Craniens, Peleulians, and Sameans delivered twenty spiece. This peace no fooner shone upon the Cephalenians beyond all their expectation, but suddenly one City of the Sameans revolted, and upon what cause it is not known; themselves alledged and said. That for a four fine their City was seated in a commodione L. place sher feared greatly to be dispossessed and curned out of it by the Romans, But whether they only imagined this and put themselves in fright, and so changed their quiet and repose for rain and foolish fear worn bether there had been question bereof among the Romans, and upon much canvaling in mens according to mour of fuch a matter, van unto them, it is not certainly known. Only thus much after they had given their hollages, they thut their City gates upon a suddens and defit they would not from their enterprise, for all the entreaty and prayers that their own holtages made, whomshe Confulhad fent (on purpose) even finder their walls, to move their countrimen and parents to pity and compassion. When as therefore they would make no answertending unto peace, the Conful began to affault the City: and all the ordnance of artillery and engine of battery were under his hand, which had been brought from the fiege of Ambracia; M And look what works and fabricks were needfull befides to be made, the fouldiers with great dil gence and forwardness performed. So in two places at once they planted rams against the City and battered the walls. The Samzans on the other fide for their part omitted and neglected mathing, that might either annoy the enemy or impeach the works. But two things there were principally wherewith they made refiftance and withflood their violence: the one was a countermure within the City, which they ever railed new inflead of the old & ful as floong as it was, that was demolished and broken down; the other was their often indden fallies, one while upon the foreifications and fabricks, otherwhiles upon the corps de guard of the enemies and for the most part in these skirmishes they had the better hand. But one mean there was devised; and the same of small show to speak of, to restrain and keep them infrom fallying forth. The Roy N mans fem to " Figure, " Patre, and Dime, for an hundred flingers. The Conful having fet the state of Cephalenia in good order, and put a gartison within Samea. naffed into Peloponnifus, having been called and fent for to come thither a long time, principally R by the Egians and Lacedemonians. Time out of mind, and from the first beginning of the Diets of Achas, the whole nation used to assemble and meet at Aginm ordinarily, were it for to grace and honour the City, or because the place was commodious therefore, This ancient custome Phislanamen that year began first to infringe, and went about to make a law and ordinance, That in all the Chies of Achas, their Councels and Diets shall be holden in course and order at their times. And against the coming of the Contul, when the Demiurges of the free Cities and states fummoned the Diet to be kept at Agium, Philopamen (Pretorfor that time) came with a countre-summons and pro-laimed it to be held at Argas. And when it was evident to be seen, this they all in manner minded thither to refort; the Conful alfo (albeit in affection he favoured the Ægians) came to Argon: where, after much debate, feeing the matter growing the other way, he c defilted from his defige and gave over the cause. After this, the Laced amonians averted him from thence, and drew him a way to the deciding of their controversies and diffentions, Certain banished persons they were who most of all disquieted and troubled that state: and many of them had their abiding place in the Castles coasting along the frontiers of the Laconian territory toward the Sea, which was taken wholly from the City. The Lacedamonians much discontented and offended hereat, entred one night a certain borough called * Las, surprised it unawares to the in * past. habitants, and kept it to their use; to the end, that if need were at any time to send Embassadors to Rome or else whither, they might have some free access unto the Sea: and withal, be served of a mart-Town for vent, and a place of receit for all forrain merchandile from strangers to their neceffary ules. The Townmen within, as also the exiles aforefaid (there dwelling) were terrified at n the first with this suddain and unexpected occurrence: but afterward (before day-light) which they had once rallied themselves together, with small ado and skirmish chased forth the Lacedzmonians: howbeit, the fear fpred over all the Sea coaft, fo that in one general accord, the Caffles and Villages every one, yea, and the exiled persons (as many as there inhabited) dispatched their Embassaciors to the Achaans. Philopamen their Pretor (who ever from the beginning friended the cause of the banished, and had alwaies advised and counfelled the Achaens to abate and take down the pullance and reputation of the Lacedamonians) granted them at their fur and feeking, a Diet. In which (upon a motion by him made) there passed a decree in this form: That whereas T. Quintles and the Romans, had committed and delivered to the lafeguard and protection of the Achaens, the fortrefles, burroughs, and villages, fituate along the Sea-coast of the E Laconians, and (by vertice of acovenant and accord) the Lacedamonians had nothing to do therein, but ougheto forbear them ; and yet not withflanding, the Town Las was by themforced; and a great maffacre there committed : therefore unleis the prin ipals and accessaries both of that our rage, were weelded to the Acheans, they deemed the covenant and accord in that behalf provided, to be broken. Hereupon incontinently were Embassadors addressed to Lacedamon, to challengo and demand the parties abovefaid : but the Lacetemonians took this for to provide commandanens, and thought is fach an indignity, that without all doubt, if they had been in as good offerenters, as formerimes they were, they would immediately have taken arms. But nothing troubled and disquieted their pints to muth as this, for fear left if once they received the yoke of subjection upon their necks, in yeelding obertience to their first demand, Philopamen Would posted and amin execution that which he long intended and went about; evento deliver the City Learning the hands of the banished aforefaid. Enraged therefore with choler and anger, they fell upon thirty of that folion who were complored in counsel with Philopamen and file chiles; and flesh chemour eight i and withol mide a deckee, To renounce and to jett all focility with the Arbanna sand forthwith totond their Berbaffadots to Cephalenia; with commifficing deling Landemon 1000 Mr. Fulvine and the Riomans; and to beleech him to take the pains to come and Pelopusis fant the nexts receive the City Laredombo under the obeitance and proceedions of the padple of Amer. When the Embaffadors had made relation hereof to the Achaans, predinals who was proclaimed against the Laredomonians by common consent of all the states of that adambly and had acut acutacts: but the winter impeacined them for enering incomy action and phintes the casion. word, warning them both to put up their (words, and lay arms afide, until they had fent their Em- N bafadors to the Senate of Rome. So there were embafages addressed both from the one and the other to Rome. In likewife the banished Lacedamonians, joined their cause and embassy with the Achaans Diophanes and Lycortas, both Megapolitans, were the chief in the embassage of the Achaans, who as they jarred and disagreed in the managing of State-affairs, so they accorded not but varied in the speeches that they delivered, Diophanes referred the decision of all matters unto the Senat as who were best able to compose all controversies between the Achaans and Lacedamonians. But Lycorias, inftructed by Philopamen, required that the Achaens might do and execute whatfoever they had ordained according to the covenant, and the conditions therein comprised: and that they would maintain their full liberty without abridging and empairing the fame according as they had received it at their hands. The nation of the Achaans in those daies was in great r credit and reputation at Rome, howbeit the Senate thought it not good to make any change and alteration in the State of the Lacedamonians. In conclusion, they returned such an intricate and doubtful answer, that both the Achæans might construe it, as if they had permission and free liberty,to do what they would with Lacedamon, and the Lacedamonians again took it, as though they had not so large a scope and absolute power allowed them, as to do their pleasure in every thing, But this authority and liberty whatloever it was, more or less, the Achaans firetched beyond all measure and compass, and used it too proudly and insolently. Philopamen continued still in place of foveraign government, and levied a power to be ready in the beginning of the fpring, and fo encamped upon the frontiers of the Lacedamonians. This done, he fent his Embassadors to demand the delivery of them into his hands, who were the authors of the revolt : promiting withal, K that if they would so do, their City should remain in peace without any molestation, and they suffer and sustain no harm, before they had answered for themselves in open audience. All the rest for fear kept filence and faid not a word, only they whom he had challenged by name, made offer of themselves to go under safe conduct received from the Embassadors, and faithful promise that no violence should be done upon their persons, until they had pleaded their answer, Accompanied they were with divers noble personages of great mark and name, both as advocats unto them in their particular quarrels, and also in regard of the Common-weal, as far as their private caple any way touched and concerned it. Never had the Achaans before time brought the Lacedamopian exiles with them into the confins of Lacedamon, because they supposed that nothing might so much alienate and estrange the hearts of the whole City as that. But then the whole head, as ir L were of the vanguard, were no other but those banished persons. And as the Lacedamonians abovelaid were coming, who should meet and affront them arranged in order of battel at the very gate of the camp, but they? At the first they welcomed them with chiding and railing, after that they fell to bitter words and brauls, and their bloud was up on both fides, infomuch as those of the banished crew who were of hottest spirit and shappest metal, made no more ado but ran uponthe Lacedamonians: whereupon they called the Gods to witness, and cried to the Embassadors for protection; who together with the Pretor himself came between, voided the preis, and saleguarded the persons of the Lacedamonians, empeaching and staying some of their hands who were already about to bind them and make them fure. But the tumult fill encreased, and the multitude was all up on a hurrey. The Achaens can first to see only what the matter was, and to M belookers on. But afterwards, when the exiles began with a loud voice to cry ont, and report was averaged and injuries they had juffained, befeeching them of their help, and avouching with-all right confidently, that if they let flip this opportunity, they should never have the like again, alledging moreover. That the league first made in the Capitol after renned at Olympia, and last of allegon firmed by a facted oath in the Castle of Athens, had been broken and dismilled by them, and therefore the guilty and culpable parties were to be punished accordingly, before they entred into any bond of new accord. At these words the multitude was incensed, and by occasion of one mans voyce, who cried to firike and knock them down, fell to flinging flones at them. And by tensoreans leventeen of them, who during the garboil chanced to be tied in bonds, were flored to death, The reft so the number of fix and thirty, were the next morrow apprehended, whom N the Pretor had thielded and protected from violence, not for any define he had to fave their lives; but because he would not have them milearry and perish before they were heard. These were presenced and exposed as a prey tothe unruly and angry multitude : and when they had made some fault peech unso them, from which they turned away their ears, they were all condemned and collection which the the laced amounts were once put in this feat, then the Hyvere commanded. And as the victory atchieved over Antiochus was more honorable and glorious to the Romans, than there over the Gauls forthe continett of the Gauls was more joyous and pleasing to the Roman allies, than that other of the ridehai. For the fervitude in which the King held them was more tolerable, than the crueley of thefe favage and inhumane barbarians, and the doubtuit fear and fright wherein they flood every day; as not knowing how far forth they would proceed, carried fo (asir were) in a temper to wast and spoil them clean. And therefore as nations who by the defeat of Antiochus recovered inberry, and by the subduing of the Cauls empoyed peace, they presented themselves not only to give thanks and shew their contentment in that behalf, but also brought with them certain coroners of gold every one according to their ability. Likewile there came Embaffadors from Antiochus, as allo from the very Gaus; to have conditions of peace ministred upro them; yea, and from Ariarates King of the Cappadocians, who craved pardon, and offred to buy out his treipais for mony, in that he had given aid unto Amiochus: and fined he was to pay 200 talents of filver. The w Gauls had this answer feturned unto them; That K. Eumenes when he came should tender unto them articles of peace. The embaffages of the other states and cities were dismissed with grations answers, and went away better pleased and contented, than they were at their coming. The Embaffadors of Amiochus were commanded to bring mony into Pamphylia, and corn likewile, according to the covenant made with L. Scipio : for thither the Conful purposed himself to some with his army. After this, having taken a review and furvey of his forces, he fet forward in the beginning of foring, and within 8 daies arrived at Apamea. There he fo journed in camp for three daies: from thence he removed, and at the third daies end came to Paniphylia, whither he had given order to the Kings Embassadors to convey their mony and corn. There he received a too talents of filver which were transported unto Apamea; The corn was divided in the army, From T thence he marched tov Porga, which was the only country in those parts held with a garrison When he approached the Caprain of the garrison met him on the way requeffing 30 daies frace in which time he might know the pleasure of K. Item, He shall pay unto King Cumenes 350 talents withinffle years ; and for corn according to the rate and proportion 127 ratefits, "trem; te shall send unto the Romans 20 hostages, and change them for of B there every three years: provided, that they be not under 18 years of ege, thorabove 45. Item; If thy allies of the people of Rome, begin of their own morion to make war upon King Antiochast it mall belawful for him to revenge himfell, and me for ible means to withit and their violence; yet fo, as he hold no City in right of war, nor receive any into amity : and all controverses which shall arise between them shall be decided by law and justice; or it both parties be so pleased they shall trie the iffue by force of arms. Item, it was comprised also within the covenants of this accord, That he should deliver into the Romans hands, Annibal the Carthaginian, Thous the Etdlian. Mnastmachus the Acamanian, Eubulus likewise and Philo the Chalcidians. Finelly, if ought hereafter happed to be added moreover, or changed otherwise the same in no care to preindice any thing contained within the covenants aforefaid. To this accord the Conful fware: and C to receive the Kings outh likewise, there went unto him Q. Minutius Thermus and L. Manlius he who fortuned at that time to return from the Oroadians. And the Cof. wrote his letters to Q. Fab. Laber Admiral of the fleet, prefently to come to Patara, and what thips foever of the Kings were there, to hew them in pieces, and make a light fire of them. So he departed from Ephelias, and either brake into fitters or burnt, 50 covered thips belonging to the King. In the fame voyage and exploit he furprised and won Telmestas, by reason that the Townsmen were so affrighted at the fuddain coming of the fleet. Thenforth with he departed out of Licia, and having given order to those that were lest behind at Ephefus to follow after, he crossed the Seas (between the Ilands) over into Greece. After he had lo journed fome few daies at Athens, until the frips from Ephelus were entred into the harbor of Pyraum: from thence he brought back his whole armado n to Italy. Ch. Manlius having received (among other things which were to be yeelded up of Antiochus) the Elephants allo, and beflowed them allfreely upon Eumenes, gave audience to the controversies of many Cities and States, amongst whom (during these changes and alterations) there arole funding troubles and much variance. And Ariarates the King, who by the means and mediation of Eumenes (unto whom about that time he had affianced his daughter in marriage) was difcharged and had acquirtance for the one moity of the mony imposed upon him entred into amity with the people of Rome. When the differences of the Civies aforefaid were debated and known, the ten Commissioners fet down an order between them, respectively to their condition. To as many as had been tributaries to King Antiochus, and yet fided with the people of Rome in affection, they granted franchile and immunity: but as many as took part with Antiochus, or were tri-E butaries phio King Attalus, those were commanded to pay their customs and duties to King Bamenes. Moreover, they freed and exempted from all task and tallage (expresly by name) the Colophonians inhabiting Notium, together with the Cymeans and the Milefians, Unto the Clazonemians (over and befides the same freedom) they gave the Iland Drymasa. To the Milesians also the territory called Sager: to the Ilians, they annexed Rhateum and Gergithus, not fo much for any fresh and fare deserts as in memorial of their ancient beginning and foundation; which was the cause also that they set Dardanus free, Semblably the Chians, Smyrneans, and Erythræans, for their fingular Toyalty and devoir which they shewed in that war they not only indowed with fair lands and refrirories, but allo graced with all kind of honor and reputation above the reft Moreover, the Phoceans had both their own lands reflored unto them which they enjoyed before the war, and also liberty to live under their ancient laws. As for the Rhodians, they had those things now confirmed and established muo them, which by a former decree were granted : and to better their effice. Licia and Caria were bestowed upon them, as far as the River Mander, all fave the City Telmeffus. Unto the dominion of King Eumenes, they laid Cherforefus in Europe; and Lyfireachia, with all the Calles, Villages, and Lands thereto belonging, in as large terms and imple manner as Antiochus held the fame : alo within Afia, the one and the other Phrygia, as well that which confineth upon Hellefront, as the other which they call the Greater. Moreover, they refored into him My Ga, which King Profias had taken from him : over and befides, Lycaonia, Myhas, and Ledia; together with these Cities by special name, Tralleis. Ephosus, and Telmessus. As couching this physication debate there was between the Agents of Eumenet and the Embaffadors bounds of their own tersitories, After this, having gathered into one place all the reflektion as the Sea coafts, together with the entire flote of King Eumenes, which by his brother Ashersaus was brought from Elea, he transported all his forces into Europe. From whence he marched through Ghersonness by short & easy journies, because his army was heavily charged with prizes and booties of all forts; and encamped at Lyfmachies, purpoing there to reft a while to the that his travelling heafts of draught and cariage, might be fresh and in good heart to pulsationsh. Thracia, which was a voyage and journey commonly feared and abhorted. The same day that he dislodged from Lysimachia, he came to the River which they call Melas, and from thence the next day to Crofela. When they were past Crofela, they had for ten miles almost no other way, but through wild woods, narrow fireights, and those rough withal and uneven underfoot, For the difficulty of which passage, the army was divided into two parts. The one helcommanded to march, before, the other to come behind in the rereward a great diffance after, and in the midft between. he bestowed the carriages with bag and baggage, and amongst them were waggons and wains. loden with the publick treasure, and other pillage of great price. As he thus marched through the ffreight pass, there were about 10000 and not above, railed out offour nations of Asia, to wir, the Astians, Canians Maduarenes, and Caletes, who befet the streights to debar them of passage, It was supposed that King Philip of Macedony his hand was herein, and that they entred not into this action without his privity and trandulent practife; who as he knew that the Romans could return no other way but by Thracia, to he was aware and wish well enough what a mass of money they carried with them. The Roman General himself was in the vanguard, careful only and troubled about the difficulty of the way, All this while the Thracians fat Hill and firred not, until the armed fouldiers were passed by. But when they perceived once, that the vanguard was gotten out of the freights, and that the rereward was far enough behind, they fell in hand with the packs and coffers of the carriages; and after they had killed the guards, some of them ransacked and rifled that which was in the waggons, others led away the pack horses and other sumpter beasts with their load and burden on their backs. Hereupon arose a cry and alarm, and was first heard of those that followed but afterwards of them also in the foreward, & so from both ends they ran to the midfly and at one time in diverie places, skirmished without all order consusedly. The Thracians heavily charged and encumbered with pillage, and most of them without any weapon at all, because they might have the use of their hands more nimble and agile to match & catch unto them their prizes, were by this means more exposed to receive hurt, and foon killed. The Romans again were much distressed and annoied through the disadvantage of the ground and the wates; which the barbarous people were well enough acquainted with, and out of them would iffueforth to encounter, and other whiles lurk within hollow blind caves, and not be feen. The very packs likewife and the waggons, standing and lying unto wardly in the way, sometime of one, and sometime of other (as it happed) troubled and hindred them much in their fight. So as herein one place lay the theef dead, there in another the true man that purfued him. And according as the plot of ground was good or bad, as well for the one fort as the other, as their hearts and courages ferved or failed them and as the number was more or less to the skirmish and fight was variable; and in one word of both fides many a man fay in the dust and lost his life. By which time the night approached, and the Thracians departed out of the conflict, not so much to avoid wounds and sor sear M of death, as for that they had sped themselves sufficiently of prizes. The Roman vanguard encamped without the forrest in the open ground about the Temple of * Bendis. The rereward remained fill behind in the midft of the woods to guard their carriage, fortified within a double pallifado offtrong stakes. The morrow after, when they had well discovered by their espials the way before them, they joined themselves with the vanguard. In this battel (over and besides a great part of their pillage loft, and a number of camp-followers and lackies flain, with some souldiers also, for that there was skirmishing every where throughout the chase) there died Q. Minutius Thermus? and a right great loss there was of him for he was a man of much valour and execution. That day the army marched as far as to the River Hebrus. From whence they passed through the confines of the Anians, neer unto the Temple of Apollo, whom the inhabitants name Zerinthous, And there N they met with another streight passage about a place called Tempyra, as rough and cumbersome underfoot as the former. But for almuch as there were no woods about it, it yeelded no good place for ambushes. Howbeit the Thrausians (a people likewise of Thrace) affembled together. hoping also to light upon the like booty. But by reason that the vallies lay naked and open, so as if any beset the narrow wates they might be discovered a far off, the Romans were less affraid and troubled. For, say that they were to fight in some place of disadvantage, yet they might arrange themselves in battel aray in open field, and join in close fight hand to hand. Being therefore embattelled in Squadrons thick and strong they charged the enemy with a great shout and cry, and at the first shock forced them to retreat and lose ground, and afterwards to turn back and flie. And in the rout they were beaten down and killed; for even their ownstreights which they seized for their vantage, empeached and hindred themselves. The Romans having gotten the victory, encamped neer a village of the Maronits, called Sare. The next day they marched through the champain open countrey Priaticus, where they fo journed three daies to take in corn, partly from out of the fields of the Maronits, which willingly of themselves they conferred upon them, and partly out of their own ships, which followed after, well surnished with all kind of provision. From this place they made but one daies journey to Apollonia, and so passing through the territory

A of the Abdetits, they came to Maples, All this way they journeied peaceably through the Colonies of the Greeks. But the reft behind if it were not dangerous unto them for my hofility, vet fufrected still it was, all the whiles that they passed night and day through the midst of the Thracians, until at length they came into Macediny. The fame army conducted fometime before by Scipio that very way, found the Thracians more gentle and srackable; for no other cause; but that they had less flore of pillage and booty with them to let their teeth on water, and fingers on itching. And yet even then allo (as allandius writeth) there were infreen thouland Thracians that encountred Matines the Numidian, as he marched before the vanguard to discover the coales; and he faith, that he had in his company four hundred Numidian horiemen, and fome few Elephants: also that his son, with an elect wing of a hundred and fifty horie brake through R the midit of the enemies, who also within a while after, (when his father Mutines having placed the Elephants in the midft, and the Horiemen in the flanks, joined in battel with his enemies, charged them upon their backs, and put them in great tear) by means of which florm and tempelt (as it were) of the Cavalry, they never came fo far, as to deal with the battel of the foormen. Cn. Manlins led his army through Macedony into Theffaly, and marching on by the way of Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where he abode all winter. For he made not so light a matter of winter failing, that he durst take the Sea, and hazard the passage at that time of the year. The year almost expired, M. Valerius the Consul returned out of Liguria to Rome, for the creation of new Magistrats, having atchieved no such memorable exploit in his Province during the time of his government, as might have yeelded any colourable reason of his long stay, in that he C came more tardy (than the usual manner was) to the affembly for an election of Coniuls: (for holden it was upon the * 12 calends of March) wherein were created, M. Emplius L. pidus and C. 18 of Fibrus Flaminius. The next day after, theie Pretors were elected; namely, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Ser, Sulpitius Galba,Q. Terentius Cull.o, L. Terentius M. Saliota, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and M. Furius Crassines.

After the election of Magistrats the Consul proposed to the Senat as touching the Provinces and governments of the Pretors. And the LL decreed that two of them should remain at Romesto minifter laws and execute justice: other two should be employed out of Italy, in Sieily and Sardin a:

two in Italy to wit, at Tarentum and in Gaul, Immediatly before they entred into office they were enjoyned to cast lots: and Ser. Suspicius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and Q. Terentins of strangers and aliens: L. Terentius took the charge of Sicily, Q. Fulvius of Sardinia, Ap. Claudius D was to govern Tarentum, and M. Furius to rule Gallia. It fortuned the fame year that L. Minutius Myrrilus and L. Manlius were delivered to the Carthaginian Embafiadors, by the hands of the Facial heralds at the commandment of M. Claudius Pretor of the City for the time being and transported over to Carthage, for that the voice and speech went, That they had beaten the faid Embaffadors. A bruit and rumour there was of a great war begun in Liguria, & which encreased every day more than other. Whereupon the Senat ordained to both the new Confuls the Province of Ligaria that day on which they propounded unto the Senat to confult about the Provinces and the affairs of the Common-weal. But Lepidus the Conful opposed himself against this their aft and ordinance alledging, "That it was a shameful indignity, that both the Consuls should be shut up and enclosed within the vallies of Liguria; whereas for two years already M. Fulvius and Cn. E " Manlins had raigned like Kings, the one in Europs, the other in Afia, in stead of Philip and An-"Fochus. And if (qd.he)it be the pleasure of the Senat that there should be armies maintained in "those parts, more meet, I wot, it were, that Consuls should have the command & conduct there-"of than those privat persons. As for them, they range about those nations, terrifying them with threats of war against whom there hath been none proclaimed making merchandice and selling "peace among them for fums of mony. Now if it be requisit and needful to keep two armies for the government and defence of those Provinces, like as M. Pulvius and Cn. Manlius Consuls, suc-"ceeded M. Acilius and L. Scipio Consuls: so C. Livius and M. Valerius the Consuls ought to have sentred in place of Fulvius and Manlius. At least wife now, when the Etolian war is finished and 66 brought to an end, Afarecovered and conquered from Antiochus, and the Gauls vanquished F fahdued, either ought Consuls to be sent unto their armies, or eise the legions to be brought "back from thence, and at length delivered to the Common-weal. The Senat not withflanding created Conful two years later than otherwise he should have been. And therefore to work him despight and make him odious to the World, he caused the Embassadors of Ambracia (whom he had suborned and set on for to lay matters to his charge) to enter into the Senat-G house. These being in place, complained that M. Falvius had warred upon them, at what time as they were in peace performed all that other Confuls before had imposed upon them and were also ready in all duty and allegeance to do the fameunto him. "First our lands and territories say "they were piteously spoiled and wasted: then were we tetrified with the sacking of our City, "and threatned with the killing of our people, that forvery fear we were forced to flut our gates. "Afterwards we were beleaguered and affaulted, and against us all kinds of hostility practifed, "by (word, by fire, by ruinating and ransacking our City. Our wives, our children, have been led

they gave him the hearing, perfifted fill in their resolution, that both Consuls should be imploied in the Province of Liguria. Yet thought good it was that Manlins and Fulvius should leave their Provinces, withdraw their forces from thence, and return to Rome. An old grudge there was

and a cankred enmity between the faid M. Fulvius, and M. Emylius the Conful: and among other matters of discontentment, Emplius gave out, that by the means of Fulvius, himself was

se and haled into captivity and bondages one goods violently taken from us: (and that which as a is hove all went secretoto our heart) our Temples throughout the mhole City despoiled and Sadboados their good your aments the images of out Gods, and finally our Gods the intelves (bhicked out of abeirsheines and places, and to carried a way ; yea, thevery walls and pillaraleft 44 Hare and naked, fourthe Ambracians have no Gods remaining among the encoadors, and to whom they might make their prayers and supplications; As they poured out their complaints. the Cariful of a mind to aggravar and heap more matter upon his adversary, ceased not to propose minuthem many interrogatories (as it was completted between them before) and drow them on to fpeak many things as if with their good will they would not have intered them. When the rest of the LL, were moved herewithschenthe other Constit C. Flaminia undertook the apologie and defence of M. Fallotus, faying, "That the Ambracians trod in an old beaten way, and did no I "otherwise than fome hefore them had done. For even fo was M. Marestas accused by the Syrasansians, fo was Q Fadous charged by the Capuans, And why by the same means suffered they Senot T. Quintius to be charged by King Philip, M. Acitius and L. Scipio by Antiochus Cn. Manlius chy the Ganls, and the same Fulvius himself by the Atolians and people of Cephalenia? That to Anal adei. was affablted, battred, and forced in the end; that images and ornaments were Staken from thence; that other acts were done and committed, which usually follow upon the winning of Towns, think we my LL, that either I in the behalf of Fulvius will deny, or Fulvius himself will disavow? who, in regard of these worthy exploits and noble acts, is minded to demand at your hands the honor of a Triumph, who purpofeth to carry before his triumphane es chasielt the portraiture of Ambrecia as it was taken, the images which they accuse him to have w ce carried away and other spoils of that City ; yea, and to fet them upon the posts of his honse for a "memorial to posterity?" No reason there is that the Ambracians should severthemselves from "the Erchans, and domore than they, for their case and condition is all one. And therefore ler my colleague shew his rancor and malice, and bewray a sestered enmity in some other cause: or "ifhe will needs follow and pursue this forward, let him intertain and keep still his Ambracians " unto the coming of M. Fulvius. And for mine own part, I will fuffer no act to pair either of the Ambracians or the Erolians, fo long as M. Fulvius is ablent. Amylius accused his enemy for having a crafty head of his own, and for his tuble for hes, as being notorious and well known to all mentiof no better staying; that full cunningly he would triffe out the time, and make delaies all the year long, that he might not come to Roma lo long as his adverfary was Conful. Thus in this de-1. base between the two Confols two dayes were spens and nothing else done. And it appeared evidently, that to long as Fluminias was in place and prefence, nothing could be concluded and determined. Whereopon a time was spied out when Flaminius chanced to be fick, and by that occasion was away. Then upon a motion made by Emphissthere passed an act of the Senat, Thatthe Authracians should have all their goods restored unto them again; that they should enjoy their freedom and franchifes, and live under their own Laws: and finally might take what cufloms, toll and imposts they would for portage, as well by Land as Sea: provided alwayes that the Romans, and their alies the Lavins, should be exempted and free there from. As for the images and other ornaments which they complained were taken out of their facred Temples, the Senat ordained that when M. Falvius was returned to Rome, the colledge of the Pontifies should M have the hearing and deciding thereof, and look what they awarded and fet down it should stand and be performed accordingly. And the Conful not content with all this, took the vantage when there were but few Senators in the house, and procured an other act of Senat in this form, That they judged Ambracia not to be reputed a City forced by affault. This done, there was by vertue of an order from the Decemvirs a folemn supplication holden three dayes for the health of the people, in regard of agricuous pestilence that difpeopled both City and Countrey. Afterthat the Latine feaffs and holy-dayes were colebrated. When the Confuls had accomplished these devotions; and rid their conficiences of feruple, and withal made afull and compleat levy to furnish legioning for both of them were defirous to have new fouldiers) they departed into their Provinces, and casted all the old. After the Confuls were fet forward on their journey, the Pro-conful Cn. Manitus returned home to Bonge. For whose sake the Pretor Servine Sulpitines aftermbled the Senat in the Temple of Belland: Where after relation made of his deeds atchieved, he demanded that in confideration thereof, due honor and thankigiving mould be rendred to the immortal Gods, and within that himself might ride triumphant into the City, The most part of the Legats and Commissioners, who had/been with him gainfaid and demed she same, and above all the reft L. Furins Purpurio, and L. Emplies Paulus, who stepped forth, and informed against him in these terms : "That they had "been lent in commission to assist Ci. Manline, for the making of a peace with Amiochus, and fi-" niffring of shanacrord and thole covenants and conditions, which were commented and begins "between him and L. Seipin, Yee Co. The acculation that day had prevailed more than his own defence, but that they continued arguing and debating in the Councel-house until it was late in the evening. Then the Senat arose with this mind (as it should seem) to deny him a triumph. The next morrow, the kinssolk and friends of Cn. Manlius! laboured all that ever they could. Likewise the authority of the ancients shood him in great stead i who said plainly that the precedent could not be sous in any histories. That a General who had vanquissed his remies, accomplished the sull time of government in his Province, and brought his army back, returned into the City as a private person, without the Lapane of the triumphapt chariot and the lawrel garland. The very indignity and shame of this example, summounted the malice of his adversaries, in so much as the Senators in a frequent assembly granted his triumph.

The remembrance and memory of this debate, was afterwards drowned in a greater contention that arole with a far mightier and more noble personage. For as Valerius Antias hath recorded, the two QQ. Perilii, called P. Scipia Africanus into question, and set him down a day peremptorily to make his appearance, and answer for himself. This action divers men construed diverslysaccording to their leveral disposition and affection. Some blamed not so much the Tribuns of the Gommons, as the whole City in general, for suffering such an abuse; discoursing in this wise: That the two chiefest States and Common-wealths in the World were become at one time unthankful, M but Rome more ungrateful of the twain. For Carthage being subdued, had banished Annibat likewife vanquished: but Rome a vietrels was about to expulse Africanus a conqueror, Others again reasoned thus that in no State there ought to be a citizen so pre-eminent and high above the reft, that he might not be under law, and brought to answer unto interrogatories accordingly. And nothing preserveth isonomy in a City, and maintaineth equal liberty more, than to have the mightiest man to hold up his hand at the bar. For what may be safely committed to any man (and furely the loveraign rule of the state least of all other things) if he be not to yeeld an accompt of the managing of his assairs? And verily, he that can not abide to be equal unto others, to proceed against such a one by rigor and force, is no injustice at all, Thus men commonly talked pro & agentra, until the judicial day came of his personal appearance, and answer to be made. Never was N there man known before that day no not Scipio himself when he was at the highest, either Conful or Genfor) accompanied with a greater train of men of all degrees and qualities, than he that day was appolucted upto the common place and court of Pleas as an accused person, there to plead his capie. Being commanded to speak in his own defence he began his oration without any mention at all of the imputations and matters with which he was charged, and entred into a difference of the acts by him archieved; and that with such a Majerly and magnificence as it was well known and confessed, that never man was praised either better or more truly than he. For with what contrage and mind he atchieved those his brave exploits indeed, with the same spirit he delivered them in words. And no man thought him tedious and was weary to hear his speech because all that he related was for his own defence in this his danger, and not upon vain glory and often tatione. The Tribuns of the Commons his adverfaries, when they had laid open certain supposed crisuses committed of old, as couching his walful excess whiles he winted in Syracuff ; as also the tion and our rage of Pleminian which happed as Last Heley proceeded to charge him by prefermption ons and fulpitions, rasher than by direct evidences and proofs, for embezling and averting to his proper the certain treasure gotten from King Anticohus; and namely that his fon being taken prilonge, was rendred unto him without ranfom and that in all other things, Scipio was respected and alone had carried the Roman peace and war under hisgirdle, Alfo that he bate fa ftrong hand of ver the Conful, more like, I wot, a Dictatator and absolute commander, then a Lievetenant and assistant unto him, all the while he was in the province. Neither aimed he and shot at any other mark, when he went that journey, but that the fame, which long before was notorioully known to Spain Ganl, Sicily, and Africk might as evidently appear to Greece, to Afre, and all to the Kings and nations of the East parts, to wit, that he was the only man, he was the chief, the head and pillar of the Roman Empire, that under the thaddow of Scipio his wing, that City which is the lady of the world, was covert and protected; that a beck and nod of his head, was as good as all arrefts of Senat and helts of people. Thus when they could not touch him in life, nor fa-Renupon himany note of infamy, they charged him all that ever they could with matter to kindle envy. Thus with orations they ipent the time untill night came, and the bufiness was put over to another day : which being come, the Tribunes, only in the times in the morning were let in their newes within the Roftra [or common ple ding place] the defendant was called, who garded with a great company of his friends and followers, patied through the mids of the affembly, approached the Roffra and flood just under it. Then after an opez ; and filence made : " My Mafters (quoth he Jyon that are Tribunes of the commons, and ye likewife Quirites, my neigh-Shors and citizens of Rome, upon this very day of the month it was that I fought a pight bartell against Annibal and the Carthaginians, with right fortunat and happy successe; meet there-6 fore and good reason since it is, that to day all pleas and actions successe; I will go directly are and immediately from hence to the Capitol and pretent my felf before Inp. Opt. Max, before "Inno and Minerva, with all the rest of other gods and goddesses, presidents and patrons of that temple and tortreffe, to perform my humble dury unto them; to falufe and thank them, for that "they have vonchiafed me that resolute fection and powerfull means with il, both on such "day as this; and also many times befides, to perform my devoir well and truly unto the Common-weal. As many of youtherefore (Quirites) as well may, go ye with me, and pray the gods to fend to you like governors to my felf; and no worfe. If I say (and not elle) as you ever "flance I was seventeen years of age, even to these mine old daies, you alwaies advanced me to honors before the ordinary time of mine age to I again advanced and prevented the faid honors "with good fervice and noble deeds. This taid he departed from the Roftra and afcended up to the Capitol, whereat the whole audience there affembled turned at once and followed Sergio; in so much as at last the scribes and notaries, ye sand the very sergeants left the Tribunes there alone, without any to bear them company but their own bondfervants and the common cryere who still from the Roftre called and cited the defendant. Scipio not only vifited the temples upon the Capitoli hill, but also made a perambulation with the people of Rome throughout the whole city to all the courches and chappels of their gods and goddeffes. "This was in manner a more foremn day unto him in regard of the affectionar favour of men, and the estimation of his true granden indeed, then on which herode into the City in triumph, over King Syphax and the Carthadinians. But it was the laft fair day the ever he faw and never shone the sunagain pleasantly apon P. Scipio. For after this, forefeeing envy growing toward him, and what a life and how. full of debates he should have with those Tribunes, upon a longer day granted for the processed 4 law against him, he retired himself apart to Liternum, of let purpose to make default and not appear to plead his canfe any more He caried a greater spirit with him, his heart was too big, & nied. he had been to an higher degree of port & honorathen to take knowledg what it was to be accused: he could not skill to vale bonet and ftoop fo low, and to abase himself to the abject condition of thate that plead for themlelves at the bar. Now when the day was come, and that in his ablence: his name began to be called, L. Scipio answered for him, and alledged sickness to be the cause why he awas away. But the Tribunes his acculers, would not admit of that excuse, replying and faying the That apon the same pride of heart, in which he avoided once before, his judicialitriall, and Distribute Tribunes and the whole affembly, he now also would not appear to make his answer. Even fo triumphed he then over the people of Rome, when accompanied with those whom he thed stee him as pritoners (after he had once taken from them their power and liberty to give fightif centure and doom of him) be fequelized himfelf that day, by way of an infarrection from "the Tributes of the Commons into the Capitol. Well are ye now ferved therefore (fay they) and Contify purilised for that dates folly and rathness: For lo, how be him elf now abandoneth you, who was your motive and leader then; to fortake us. See how every day more then other our secourage in fallen and heart abated a mand dare not we now fend tolk to fetch him (a privat perstion and no more) out out of his farm and house in the country, and make him to appear and "plead his an wer, anto whom not past 17 years ago, at what time as he was General of an ar-"Tray on land & Admirall of the Armado by leasure were so bold as to lend Tribunes of the Com. Stan Raile, to arrest and bring him away with them to Rome ? In the end, thereft of the Tribatts brette Combeing called carnelly unto by L. Scipie for their lawfull favour, fet down his order de conclusion, that iffickness were alledged for his excuse, and that there were nothing else but it the occasioned his absence, it should be received for good & lawful, and their colleagues should adjoint distrial to a farther day. It fortuned at that time that Tib. Semprenius Gracchus was one of the Tribunes, between whom & P. Semiethere was some quartel. He forbad expresly that histown usmethould be subscribed to the instrument of the aforetaid decree of his colleagues. And when every man looked to hear tome heavier tentence denounced against [Seipie, he awarded baburt in this maner. "For as much as L. Scipio excufeth the absence of his brother by sickness, it is good H " and fufficient in my opinion. And more then th at, I will not for my patt fuffer P. Septoto be ac-"cufed before he return again to Rome. Yea, and then also, if he call for my helping, hand I will "give him alsiftance, and frop the course of processe against him. And as to the main point of "the caute, this is my relolution, that P. Scipio being advanced to highly as he is to that bitch of "honor, by his noble and famous exploits, and by the dignities received at the hands of the peo-" pleof Rome, as if both gods and men had confented to fet him aloft, for him to come down "now and frand pleading below at the bar beneath the Rollra, and there to have his cars glow "and ring again with the checks and taunts of certain green heads and buffe youths, were a grea-"ter shame and disgrace to the people of Rome, then to himself. Nay, he stated not thus with "this bare award, but fealed and fet it on furely with words of indignation, tellifying his discon-Stentment for this course and manner of proceeding. And shall Scipio (quoth he, my master Tri-"bunes) that renouned conqueror of Africk, fland under your feer at your devotion? Defeated "he and put to flight in Spain 4 most brave and noble Generals of the Carthaginians, with their 4 entire armies? Scipio b. d his brother copariner with him) and all "for this, to be troden under fo or of two Petilis? And that ye fhould leek to triumph over P. A. fricanus? Will it never be better? Shall greet personages with all the good celetts of their own for all the dignities and honors by you upon them conferred) never reach and attain to a firong "fort and fure place of defence, wherein they may make account to be lafe and past all danger, K of and wherin their old see may reft and repole, if not with worthip and honout, yet at leaft-wife in fecurity, exempt from abute and violent ourrage? The fentence it felf of Gracebus (enforced "with such a speech especially) moved not others only, but also the very accusers themselves; who made no other rejoinder again but thus, That they would confider better what they might by their place and what they ought of duty to do. When the affembly of the people was was broken up, the LL. of the Senat began to fit in councell; where, the whole order of the Senasors (but principally the ancients and as many as had been Confuls) highly commended and thanked Tib. Gracebus, for that he had preferred the weal-publick, before privat grudges and particular quarrels. But the Petilis were well thent and batted with reproschfull checks and bitter rebukes, in that they would feem to rife by the fall of another, and fo grace themselves with L the diffrace of Africanni, and teck to triumph over him and be enriched with his spoils. Well after that, there was no more words of Scipio Africanus. The relt of his life he palled at Liternam and never had mind to come to the City : there ended he his daies in a country village; and (as they fay) he charged his executors upon his death-bed, to inter him in that very place. And there his tomb or monument was built, because he would not that to much as his funeral obleanies should be performed at Rome, (his native country) to unthankfull as it was. A rare man he was and worthy to be recommended to the memory of all polterity : howbeit the former part of his life was more singular and memorable, as well for the conduct of martiall exploits in war, as the governance of civill affairs in peace, then in his latter daies. For in his youth, he followed the wars continually; whereas in his oldage, as his body decaied and faded, to what foever he did, M loft much of the wonted beauty and loftre. Besides, there was no matter presented, to employ that wit and spirit of his. What ods was there between his former Consultaip and the second, although ye put his Cenforship to it in the ballance? What comparison was there, and what femblable thing in that lieutenancy of his in Afia? of to little or no emploiment was it by reason of his own ficklineste; and blemished withall, by the occasion of the misfortune of his son. And afterward, his return home again was no leffe unfortunat, for the hard choice whereunto he was driven, forced of necessity to abide the trial of a doubtfull issue in judgment, to quit withall his native City for ever. Howbeit he alone went away with the honor above all other, of finishing the punick war, as great and dangerous to the Romans as any that ever they made. When Africans was once dead and his head laid, his advertisties and enemies were aloft : of whom, M. Porcins Cato was the chief and principall: a man who was wont to bark (as it were) and rail against him during his life in regard of his greatness. And it is thought, that the Petilis were let on by him, and procured through his perimation, both in the life of Africanus to have drawn out, and after his death to have preferred a bill in this form and manner following : May "it please you to grant and ordein, that true seach and diligent enquiry be made, what same of "mony were taken in prize, carried away, and levied away of King Antiochus and thefe which "were under his obedience and dominion; and that of as much therof as came not into the pub-"lick treasury and chamber of the City, Ser, Sulpisine (the Pictor of the City) may propose unto "the Senat, to know their advice and pleature touching it : that whom foever of all the Pretors O "for the time now being, it thall please the Senar to appoint, he may fit in commission and inqui-"fition thereof. This bill was first crossed by Q and Lucian Mammen, who thought it meet and reason, that the Senat alone (as at all times heretosote) should make due enquiry of the monies so purloined and embezled: as is aforelaid, and not brought into the common cheft of the City. The Petilis charged the Scipies for being over great and mighty and as it were KK.in the Schat, to cary all before them. L. Furins Purpures (a manthet had been Conful, and one of the ten commissionors in Afa, was of opinion, that the forfaid enquelt should be granted in more large & ample terms,

The eight and thirtiesh Book of T. Livius.

A namely, as conching the mony hot only taken from Arthochas, but also from other Kings and nasions : coverely taxing herein Cn. Manline his old enemy. L. Scipio on the other fide frenned forth to diffwade this matter; albeit it was thought the would rather speak in defence of himself. then against the thing. He complained much and shewed his grievance, that such a bill as this should come forth now, and be fet on foot after the death of his brother Africanns, the gioft vailiant knight and nobleft perionage that ever was. As if it were not inficient, that P. Africanse " wanted the folemn Panegyrick ofation at the Roffra after his death, but he must be accused al-" fo. Why? the very Catthaginians are contented with the exile of Annibal, and feek no more: "but the people of Rome is not fatisfied even with the death of Scipio, unlesse both his own good a name after he is buried be wounded and mangled, and his brother also (to fill up the measure of er mens malice and hatred) be killed and facrificed upon his tomb. M. Cate spake in the behalf of the bill, and perfusaded that it might paffe. His oration as touching the treasure of King Antiochus, it extant to be icen: and by the majefty of his authority, he diverted the two Munmit Tribunes of the Commons, clean away, from interpoling them elves any more. When they once had renounced and given over their negative, all the tribes in general passed their voices affirmatively, Vei rogaftis. After this, Ser. Sulpitius proposed unto the Senat, Whom they would appoint for this enquest according to the act Petilia? and the LL. of the Senat deputed Q. Terentime Culleo. This Pretor was so great a friend to the house of the Cornelis, that some authors. namely thole, who report how P. Scipio both died and allo was carried forth to be enterred at Rome (for that bruit also runneth current) have written, How he went at his funeralls before C the bier and the mourners, with a cap of liberty or, his head, like as he had done before in his triumoh, and gave fweet wine or mede to all thole that attended the convoy, as far as to the gate Copena. This honour he did Scipio at his death, for that among other prisoners in Africk, he was by his means recovered out of the enemies hand. But it should seem rather, that he was such an enemie to that family, that for the cankred rancour and malice which he carried against that name. he was by the adverte faction of the Scripios, choien especially of purpose to fit upon & execute that inquifition. But certain it is, before this Pretor (all in, his extremities, who either in love & friendthip, or in hatred and enmity, kept no mean) information was given immediately against L. Scisio. Prefentments were made likewife, and the names received of his lieutenants A. Hoffling and L. Hollilius both Catos : and of his treaturer belides, C. Furins Aculeo. And to the end that is D should appear to the world, that they were all attaint of this crime of purloining and robbing the publick freasure of the common-west in one complot, there were two secretaries also and one of his lergeants called into queltion. But thele three last mentioned, and L. Hofilias beforens. med, were found unguilly and acquit, before Scipio had his judiciall triall : howbeit Scipio and A. Hoftilins his lientenant, together with C. Furins were condemned. Sciplo, for that he (as Valerius Antian writeth)to make a more case peace to the contentment of Antischus, received 6000 pound weight of gold, and 480 pound weight of filver more then he brought into the City chamber. A. Hollilas, for that he likewife detended eighty pound weight of gold, and 483 pound of filver: and Faring the Queftor for keeping back to his own ule 130 pound of gold, and two hundred of filver. These sums I set down of gold and filver, as I find them gathered and registred by Valeri-E as Antias in his Chronicle. As for the fum of gold and filver, which L. Seine should embezie. I would rather think that the clerk of fecretary faulted with the pen in writing the copies, then the author lied followd with his tongue in the fifth inditing of the Originall. For it is more likely of the twain, that the weight of the fivet was more then of gold. As allo for the fine wherein he was condemned. for P. Scipio, hath the name of M. Naviar, a Tribune of the Commons : but through the whole

Oration it felf there is no mention at all of that accusers. He termeth him one while Nobale H [Knave] and another while Nugater [Countier.] In like fort the cration of Gracebus maketh no mention at all either of the Petilis, the accusers of Africanas, or of the day assigned unto him for his answer. And we trust devite to tell the whole tale otherwise, it would have it to agree with the oragion of Gracebus; and follow we must those subors; who write, that when L. Senie was accused and condemned for taking bribes of King Amisochus, his brother Africanus was Embassador in Tuica my ; and upon the news of his brothers misfortune, left his embaffage and made half to Rome. Where he took his way directly from the gate to the common place (for that it was told him how his brother was going to prison) and thinft the sergeant from his body, yea, and when the Tribunes themselves would have relirained him, he used violence against them, and caried himself in this action to, as he shewed more kindness and love to his brother, then maners . and civility otherwise. For thus complaineth Gracebus in his oration, that the Tribunes author rity and power was infringed and broken by a privat person. And in the latter end, when he promiled to atsift L. Sergie, he knit up his speech with thele words, that it was a thing more tolerable that both the Tribunitian puissance and the Common-weal should icem overcome and surmounted by Tribunes themselves, then by a privat man. But he aggravated and enforced this one violence and excessive outrage against him, and made it odious in such fort, that in blaming him for to much overshooting himself and degenerating as it were from his own nature, he rehearted the commendable parts of his moderation and temperat carriage of himfelf aforetime, and that in fo good terms and ample maner, that thereby he made him fome part of amends for the tharp re-prehension he used for the present. For he laid, that in times past he had rebuked and reproved K the people, when they would have made him a perpetuali Conful and Dictator; that he had forbidden exprelly, that any of his Statues in triumphant habit, thould be fet up and erected in the publick places of affemblies, as in the Commission and Curia, in the Capitoll and chappell of Indicer Opt. Max. These commendable reports of him, if they were uttered in an oration penned of purpole for his praise, must needs testifie and shew a wonderful magnanimity of his, in the moderat use of high honours according to a civil port , which an enemy by way of reproach and upbraiding him, schnowledgeth and confesseth. But all writers accord, that Gracebus, took to wife the yonger of his two daughters (for the elder without all queltion was affianced and given in marriage by his father to P. Cornelins Nafica, But it is not to certainly agreed upon, whether the was both betrothed and wedded allounto him, afters her fathers death or no. As allo, whether L it be true (as it is reported) that when L. Seipie was a leading to prilon, Gracebus, feeing none of his own tellow Tribunes to fuccour and refeue him, wate a great oath and protested that he was an enemy still to the Scipiose as much as ever be was, and would not do any thing to curry favour with them, or to come into their grace, yet could be never endure that he frould be caried to that prison, into which he had seen his brother Africants lead Kings, great generals and commanders of enemics, captive. Moreover, that the fame day the Senat fortuned to be at supper together in the Capitol, and arole up all at once, and requested Africanus to affiance his daughter to Gracehus, before the supper and banket was ended. Which espoulais being performed with all due complements accordingly, during the time of that folerante. It, Seight, when he was returned home to his houle, faid anno his wife £mylta, that he had fianced and beltowed his daughter upon an hus-M band. She then falling into a fit of choler like a woman, and chafing that he had not made her acquainted with the matter, and taken her advice touching the maiden, who was as much her child as his, brake out into these words withall, that if he had given her in marriage to Tiberias Gracchus, yet good realon it was that the mother should have been at the making of the bargain.

Whereupon Sciplo took great contentment and joy at this conformity of Judgment in the choice, and inferred ftreight waies, that he was the manto whom the was espouled. Thus much I thought good to relate of this worthy and noble person, albeit there is great variety of opinions, and diverlity of writings in that behalf.

After the Pretor Q. Terentins, had finished the inquisition and whole processe thereof, Hessian N. line and Farine, who were attains and condemned, that very day put in infficient furcties to be bound in recognisance to the treasurers of the City, for the paiment of their fines. But Sepiedebating the matter still, Se pleading that all the mony which he had received was in the City chamber, other he had purloined none of the publick treasure, was laid hold on to be had away and committed to priion, P. Scipie Nafica called unto the Tribunes for their help, and made a freech full of true praises and commendations, not in generall only of the whole name and family of the Corselis, but in particular sife of his own house. The Tribune could endure no longer their rebakes and checks, and therewith departed out of the temple : then the Pretor Ser. Now approached the time of the folemn affembly for the election of Confuls, and because M. Martins Fhilipus, Atter that were Pictors clefted, to wit T. Manine, P. Cornelius Salia, C. Calburnius Pife, M. Licinius Lucullus, C. Aurelin Scaurus, and L. Quinius Criffinus. In the end of the said veer, after the magnitrates were thus ercated, Cu. Manisa Velfo the third day before the Nones of March, triumphed over the Gauls who inhabit Afia. The caule why he triumphed fol te, was this, for that he would avoid making his answe (according to the act of Petitur) whiles Q. Terentim: Calleo was Pretor, fearing he should barn in the flame of the same femence and judgment whereby L. Scepto had been conde med, or left the flame of another mans judgments n I mean the lentence wherby L. Scipio had been condemned, would have been too hot for him and caught hold of him likewife : confidering that the jury and enqueft were more incented and prowoked against him then Scipie; for that he succeeeding after him, had spoiled and neared with all kind of licentious loomets, the military discipline, which Seipio had observed most precisely and severely. Neither was he noted and touched in name for those things only which by bare hearfay were reported to have been done in the province, far remote from the view of men, but alfo of those particular infrances to be feen daily in the demeanor of his louidiers. For verily the forein excelle and ftrange superfluities took beginning from the Asian army, who brought all with them into the City. They were the first with in Rome that took up the use of braten tables of rich counterpoints, carpets, cupboord-cloths, bangings and carteins of fundry kinds of tyffue. Then came up the maner of having at bankets finging miniken wenches, and such as could play upon the dulcimers or other instruments of mulick, with dancers, jetters and other pastimes, and delightiome pleatures and fits of much at the table. Then began the boord to be furnished and fet out with more exquisit & deinty Viands, and of greater expense. Then Cooks, who in old time were reputed the most contemptible flaves, as well for calling as co ftimation, as for the use they were put unto, came tobe in great request : and that which before time was a mechanical kind of manual (ervice, grew now to be accompted a leience of deep skill and understanding. And yet all these things that then bare so great a shew, were scarce so much as small seeds and slips, to the excessive superfluities that were to ensue. Well, C. Menlins caried in triumph two hundred crowns of maisic beaten gold, weighing twelve pound a peece : of filver 220000 pound weight : of gold 2103 pound weight : of Attick

These mylleries of his at first he taught but unto a few, how heit afterwards they began to be communicated and divulged as well to men as women a said to this religion were added pleatures and delights of wine and good cheer to the end that more culturers might be allured and enticed for to have a liking thereof. Now when wine bad drowned and delled the understanding : when the night feation, when the entermingling of men and women together one with another (and namely, they of yong and tender yeers, with those of elder age) brid clean put out and extinguished all respect and regard of shamefall honesty : there began first to be practiled all forts of corruption, for every one had all pleasures ready at commandment, and his choice of those whereto by nature he was more prone and given to luft after. Neither was there wickedness committed here, of one lore, namely, the abusing of mankind and womenkind one with another without diffinction; but out of this thop and workhouse proceeded falle witneffes, forging of feals, depolitions, and teltimonies; and more then fo, wrong and untrue informations. From hence came the divelish cast of poisoning, and privy murders of the neerest of kindred in one house; and the same so secret, that otherwhiles the bodies would nobbe found to be committed to the earth. Many finfull parts were there played by way of fraudeguile, and cuning confensge; but more by apert force. As for violence, it was kept clote and hidden, by reason that with the hideous noiles, with the lound of tymbrels, tabors and cymbals, there could no voice be heard of such as cried out, when either they were forced to villany and abuse, or beaten to deathing The infection of this catching poison of Hetraria, spred as far as Rome, like a contagions malady. At the first the spacious capacity of the City, having been used to wink and bear with some enormities, concealed all : at length revealed it was to the Cof. Poftbania, much after this maner.

When he was come home, and that his mother was in hand with him telling him what he must do this day and that day, and to forthibe flatty denied and faid plainly, he would do peither the one nor the other, and at one word, professed and consecrated he would not be, what over came of Cit. His father in law was present and at one en of this resolute speech of his. His mother straight. waies cried out and laid, that he could not find in his heart to he apart from Hilpala one ten dajes, and that he was to far bewitched and envenomed with the charms & poiloned allu ement s and baits of that falle terpent and pertious Hydra, that he had no respective regard either of his mother, or mothers husband, no, not any reverent fear of the immortall gods. The mother rated him of one fide, the farener basted and courted him on the other, till in the end they hunted him out of dores with 4 bondhives belides. The yong man betook himself to Ebutta, an auntitat he had by his father five, and showed her the whole matter, why his mother had thrust him out of her houle by the need and thoulders: which done, by her advice and counfell the next day he opened and declared the same in great fecret, without the hearing of any cartilly creature, to the D Coolin Posthumins. The Coninl commanded him to repair again unto him three dates after and for for that time ditmifled him. Then the Contul in the mean while enquired of his wives mother Sulprise, a brave and lone matron whether fire knew an old wite called Ebutis dwelling in the Aventine ? Yes that I do gd the, and I know her to be an honest dance, and a woman of the old world, and tew her like now adayes. I must needs speak with her (qd, he) and therefore I would have you lend's messenger unto ther, for to will her to come hither. I but as at the first lending came unto Xalaria; and the Confol within a while forced (as it were by chance) into their company. & began to find some talk of her prothers son Ebutius: with that the woman eyes stood full of water, and with tears the began to be wall the cate and mithap of the yong man; who being foothed of all his goods and patrimony (by those who of all others should least have done it) was now at E home in her house, chaled and driven out of doors by his own mother stor that the honest good youth (God bleffe us all and be mercifull unto us) was unwilling to be confectated and admitted to certain filthy and detellable facrifices (if all be true that is reported thereof.) The Conful had enough now, and was fully perswaded of Ebucion, that he had told him no lie. Then he gave Ebutia leave to go her wales home, and requelted his mother in law Salpitia aforefaid, to lend likewile for Hispala from thence out of the Aventine to come unto her , a woman (ad.he) affranchiled and well enough known to all the neighbours of that fireet : for that I have somewhat also to lay to her, Hilpala was somewhat disquiered at this mellage, to think that she should be sene for to lo noble and hopourable a dame, and knew no cante wherefore. But after that the faw the Liftors before the entry of the doore, the troop and train also belonging to the Confel, and with-F all the Containmielf in person, the was attoried and (in manner) half dead, The Containes With him his wives mother, had the woman into an inward room of the house, and faid anto her, that the need not to be affraid, if to be the could find in her heart to tell the truth : and for this ince thereof, the thould have the faithfull word and promite either of Sulpitia (a lady of fo good create and reputation) or of ministiff heed were. Only he would have her to atter and de-dated with with of district done at the grove of Stantain the Bacchanals, where they used to iterifies in the night featur. The working had no fooner heard that word, but the fell into such a few, frimibling and qualifier all over the today, that for a good while the was not able to open her had speak a word." Dur after the was come to her fell spain out of this trance, and by them to be entire and a finding of the side, that when the was a very yong wench and a bond-maid, the togettler with her mittreffe, was there professed and conferenced but for certain yeers of late, and handly lines that the juga affranchised and made tree, the was not acquainted with the place, nor will not what work was there. I contine thanks for this yet (quoth the Conful) that thou denialt not how thou went there entred into that profession; but tay on and tell out the relt as truly and faithfully. She appropried again, that the knew no more then the had already discloted. I be eight and thirtieth Book of T. Livius. as otherwise the might if of her felt the confessed the thing , for atmuch as he who had all from H your own mouth, hath already discovered the whole. The woman knew where he was then, and was perswaded verily (as it was indeed) that Ebutins was a blab of the tongue, and had revealed this fecret : whereupon fhe fell down at the feet of Sulpitia; and first began in most humble manner to beleech her that the would not luffer, that words of course passed between her anentrape chiled woman and her paramour, should turn not only to earnest and importance, but also to a capitoll matter, to touch her as much as her life was worth : for what I taid (quoth the) was but to fright him, and not forthat I knew any fuch thing. Poff humins hereat was chafed, and felling a fit of choler . What? (quoth be) thou thinkest belike that they are jesting and cogging with thy lover Ebucius, and forgettelt how thou art in the house of a right worshipfull lady, and in communication with a Conful. But Sulpitia on the other fide, willed her to Hand up, (affrighted t as the was) and withall, both exhorted her to be of good cheer, and alto appealed the wrath of her fon in law. In the end after the had taken a better heart unto her, the greatly blamed & found fault with the diffoyalty and falfhood of Ebutins for ferving her to, and requiring her full badly again for to fingular a good turn that the had done him, and then faid, That the flood in great awe of the gods, whole fecrets the should reveal and divulge; but in greater fear of men, who no doubt for bewraving these matters, would be ready to tear her in pieces with their very hands And therefore the belought Sulpitia, and entreated the Conful to take iome order for her, and to fend her into some placeout of Italy, where the might passe the rest of her daies in safety vet of her life. But of good cheer woman (quoth the Conful) let me alone for that, I will provide well enough, that thou shalt live at Rome, and that without all danger. Then declared Hispata the origin. K ginall and first commencements of these facrifices and folemnities. At the beginning (qd, she) it was priviledged place & confectated for women only & they alone medled with those mysteries: neither was it the cultome and manner, that a man should enter in among them: and three let holidayes they had in the yeer, during which time, the priefts of Bacchus performed their ceremonies in the day time, and folk were admitted by them, to their religion and profession; and women they were all (and those matrons) who were created priells for that purpole, in their time & turn one after another. But Paculla Minia (a Campane woman) when the was the prieft change ed all, as being advertised and admonished by the gods to to doe : for the was the first that facted and admitted men, to wit, her own ions Minius and Herennius the Certinians : flie alicred the folementy from the day to the night; and forthree daies in the whole yeer, the ordered five ine. L very month, to terre for the attendance and ministery of these mysteries. Since which thing that thete tecrifices & ceremonies were thus divulged, & men ad women intermingled together & the licentious liberty of the night time also to help all forward, there is no act to wicked, no fact to wagging their bodies to and fro after a fanaticall fashion as if they were distracted & out of their

filthy, but there it is committed , and more finful & unnatural abuse there is, of manking one with another, then there is of women. If any are either unwilling to fuffer this foul filthiness, or bellir themselves more dully in the beaftly action and performance of that villany, such presently are to be killed and facrificed as beafts. And this, is supposed among it them, the principal point and sum of their religion, to hold and believe that nothing is unla wfull what foever. The men flaking and right wits, feem to divine and tell things to come. The women, attired like the she-priefts of Bac. M chas, with their heads unbound and their hair hanging loole about their eats, run down with flaming torches to the river Tyber; where they dip their torches into the water, and take them out again light burning still because they are made with sulphur vive and quick lime and they fay that certain men are by the gods carried away from among them, no man knoweth whither ; fuch as they bind falt to a certain engine or frame, and barry them out of fight into certain hidden caves: and those be such, as either would not swear to be of their conspiracy, or be partners with them in al their milchievous delignments, or endure against kind to be abused. The number & multitude there affembled, is exceeding great, and grown now be another body of a people : and among them are some noble persons, as well men as women. But now for there two years last past, or N deined it is. That some should be there professed and sacred above twenty years old for such ages shey lay for to ferve their turn, as are foonest seduced and drawn to errour, or most subject to be forced to toffer abute and villany. When the had thus finished her information and discovered all, the fell down upon her knes again, and lay at their face, and repeated her former in priceiron the second time, to wit, That he would lend ber a way out of the country. Then the Countries treated his mother in law to spare some void corner of her house, whet same Hipsel a night ceitre her felf, and there make her abede. So the allowed her an upper logging in her hould, the and the flaurs that led towards the firest were stopped up, and the entities turned into the hould. Then presently were all the moveable goods and houshold stuff of Fallenia removed; and het family tent for thither, and there entertained. Likewife Ebutim was commanded to go and lodge O with a tenant or client belonging to the Conful. Thus when both the informers were forthcoming and under Post humins his band, he declared the whole matter to the Senat. And after be had laid every thing abroad in order, namely, what was reported said him first, and what he had learned afterwards by enquiry, the Lords of the Senat were surprized with exceeding great fear, as well in regard generally of the commonweal, left those conspiracies, nightly meetings and conventicles, might import some secret complet of milchief and danger : as also for doubt in in particular, that some of their own friends or family should be accessary and culpable.

A The Senat yet were of this mind, that the Conful was highly to be praifed and thanked, for that he had found out and brought to light fuch a matter as this, both with fo fingular care & diligence, and allo, without any tumult and uprore, Then they took order and ordained, Imprimis, That the Confuls should have an extraordinary commission to make leach and inquisition into these Bacchanals and night factifices. Item, That Election and Feffenia the informers thereof should not be prejudiced thereby, nor come to harm for it, yea; and that a recompence and reward should be propounded to others that could give light and reveal the same. Item, That the Prictis belonging to these religious, be they men of women, should be sought out not only at Rome, but in all other markets towns, fairs and places of frequent refort, and convented before the Coff. to be and remain at their disposition. Item, That proclamation be made at Kome, and edichs four through-B our all state, that no person what soever, who had been facred & professed religious by the Priess of Biochus, refort any more into affembly or conventicle for those factifices; ror yet do ought pertaining to such divine service. And above all things, that information and presentment be made of all those that had frequented such meetings or conventicles, to commit who redome or any fuch filthiness and wickedness, And these were the ordinances of the Senat, The Coss, then granted their warrants out to the Ædiles Curule to make diligent least hand enquiry for those Priests of that religion, and upon apprehension to keep them in free ward and large prilon forthcoming for to be examined: also to the Ediles of the Commons to look well, that no lervice of the gods be celebrated in fecret Moreover, the Trintivirs capital were straightly charged to set good watch and ward throughout the City, and see to meetings by night, for fear that no scare-fire caught hold C of any place, To those three Commissiones or Triumvirs were five other Quinquevirs adjoyned affiftants, who every one should watch well and take charge of all the houses of his quarter within Tyberis; Then the Coff, having let them about these their severali charges mounted up the Rostra or place of publike audience. And when the people were affembled together, then the Conful afterhehad pronounced the folemn prayer which Magistrats are wont to use as a preamble, before they make speech unto the people, began his Oration unto them in this wife, "Never in any The Oration of your affemblies, O Quirites, was this folemn prayer unto the gods, either to meet and conve-of the Conful " nient, or fo requisit and needfull as in this, to advertise and put you in mind, that those be the Polituming, for "true gods indeed whom your ancestors ordained, that you should honour, serve, worship, and the overtire "prapumte, and not the dehere who prick Septovoke (as it were) with goods of furies, your plints of the D "and minds transported and carried away with falle and fittange religions to commit all wicked-"neis mischief, & filthy lust Surely for mine own part I wot not either what I were best to con-

Emylin the Coff had : moreover, by an actor the Senat enjoyeed they were to enroll two new legions befidest and withall they levied of the Latine allies 20,000 foot, and 3000 horses 3000 footmen also and 200 horsemen Romans. All there forces (setting ande the legions lit was thought good to be led to furnish out the army in Spain. And theriore the Coss, whiles they were themselves in person occupied about the forelated inquisitions, gain ecomo issue of T. Mening to to take the multers. And when those enquests were performed and done as is beforesaid Q. Marzing took his journey first of the twait towards the Appans in Liquid But whiles in eager purious of them he engaged himself into the fe ret and blind p fles, wherein a all times they had their lurking retreats and places of fate receir : within those fireights and passages which the enemies had leized before, he was environed by shem in a place of great disadvantage: where he lott 40 to K fouldiers, with three entigns of the fecond legion, and eleven banners of the Latineallies which were all taken by the enemies. Also much armour and many weapons were thrown away here and there, by reason that they were ensumbred therewith as they fled through the woody paths of the forrest : neither did the Ligurians give over their chare, before that the Romans ended their flight. The Conful fo foon as he was escaped out of the enemies territory fent his army away into divers ports of the peaceable country to the end, that it might not be feen, how much histories were empaired, yet could not be for all that suppress and imother the bruit that was blown abroad of his unfortumar journey, nor cancell the remembrance of the overthrow tor ever after the forrest out of which the Ligurians hunted him was called, The fireights of Martin ... A little before the news of the affairs in Liguria, the letters out of Spain were read, confaining forrow L. mixed with joy; to wit, That C. Catinian (who two years before went as Prator into that Provinte flought a field with the Luftans in the terri ory of Allen, where, coco enemies fell upon the fword ; and the reft were discomfitted put to flight and driven out of their camp Averwards, he conducted his legions to the affault of the town Affa, which he forced and won with no greater ado than before he gained their camp. But as he approached near the walls and rook no good heed to himself, he was wounded, and of his hurt within tew daies died. Upon the reading of thefeletters (importing the death of the Pro-Prator :) the Senat was of advice to dispatch a melfenger (to overtake the Pratome Calpharains) as far as the port of Lunagand give himsen underthand from the Senat that their advice was he should make all the haste he could in his journey, to the end that the Province might not be without a governor there to command. The confrier in which was lent, within four daies arrived at Lunu: and but few daies before, Calphangu was departed and had put himself in his journey.

Moreover, L. Manlius Acidinus (who was gone into his Province av the same time that C. Catining went) firm k a battell likewife with the Celtiberians in the hicher Province of Spain. Bet they departed on both fides out of the field with doubtfull wictory fave only that the Celtiberians the next night following diflodged and removed from thence; whereby the Roman had liberty and time both to intertheir dead, and to gather up the spoils of their enemies. And within few daies'after the same Celtiberians having raised a more puissant army bof themselves gave the Romans battell near the City Calagarra. It is not fet down in the hillory, what should be the cause why they were the weaker, confidering their number was re-enforced to but foiled they were if N fight and had the overthrow. Of the enemies there died upon 12000 and not fo few as 2000 to ken prisoners : and the Romans like wife were Masters of the camp. And had not Mantine been emperched and reftrained in this train of victory (which he hotly followed) by the coming of Calpharaim his fucceffor in government, the Celtiberians had been utterly subdued, The new Prators withdien both armies to their wintring harbors.

At the same time that these never came out of Spain, the places called Taurilia were exhibited two dates together in honour of the gods. And after them, M. Falvini fet out (with great firm iture infumpenous maner for the space of ten days) hisplaies which he had vowed in the Etolian was. And for to do him honour and grace this folemnity; many cunning actors and players came out of Greece. This was the fift time that there was represented at Rome the flew of champions O and wreftlers for the best game: then also was exhibited the passime of hunring and baiting Lions and Panthers : and in one word, these sports were celebrated with an great magnificence and variety almost as the modern passimes and games in the fordaire. After all this was holden a Novemdial feast; during which, there wasmitch facrificing, and all by occasion that for three daies it rained flones in the Picene country: and because it was reported. that the lightning indivers places, and in fundry forts, had blafted and lightly finged the garmenes afpeciation many folk.

To the faid feath, there was adjoyed a supplication of one day, ordained by a decree of the Pontifices for that the Chappel of the goddeis Oper (tanding in the Capitol) was smitten with a thorndurbole. In regard of shele prodigies, the Coff procured expiation by factificing greater beafts and fo they purged and hallowed the City. At the same time word was brought out of Umbria, that there was an Hermaphrodite or Scratfound almost twelve years old. This was held for a detestable monfler; and therefore order was given; that it should be kept out of the territory of Rome. and killed out of hand.

The same year, certain Gauls from beyond the Alps passed into the territory of Venice, without forraging, spoiling, and using any hostility; and not far from the place where as now Aquileia flandeth, they feized upon a plot of ground to build a City in. Certain Roman Embaffadors were B fent about this matter, beyond the Alps; where they received this intelligence and answer from the inhabitants of the country, That neither those Gauls took that voyage and expedition by authority and warrant from the whole nation neither knew they what they did in Italy, L. Scipio likewise about the same time, set out his plaies for ten daies together; for which he Said that he had made a vow during the time of the war against Antiochus, & he defraid the charges thereof with the money contributed unto him by divers KK, and States for that purpose Valerius. Antias writeth, that after he was condemned, and his goods conficat and fold he was fent in Embassage into Asia, for to take up certain controverses and differences between the two KK. Antiochus and Eumenes: and then it was (faith he) that the faid contribution was made, and many skillul artificers and plaiers gathered unto him out of all Asiand in the end, after this Em-C baffage, he moved the Senat for these games, because he had made no mention nor words at all of them after the faid war: by occasion whereof (by Valerius his faying) he vowed them. The year being now at an end, Q. Martius in his abience was to leave his Magistracy; & Q. Posthumins having face upon the inquifition aforefaid, and with all fide ity and carefull diligence that might be brought it to an end, held the folemn affembly for election of Magistrats: wherein were chosen Cost. Ap. Claudius Pulcher & M. Sempronius Tuditavus, And the morrow after were elected for Prators, P. Cornelus Cethegus, A. Posthumius Albinus, C. Afranus Stellio, C. Attillius Serranus, L. Polthuming Templanus, & M. Claudius Marcellus. At the years end, upon the relation of Sp. Polthumins the Col that in his visitation about the enquests aforesaid, as he rode along the sea coasts of Italy on both fides, he found certain Colonies dispeopled and desolate, to wit, Sipontum upon In the Adriatick fea, and Buxentum upon the Tuscan. T. Manius the City Prator by vertue of an act of the Senat in that behalf) created three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for to enroll and plant new inhabitants there, namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tucius, and Cn. Babius Tamphilus,

The war against King Perfeus and the Macedonians, which now was a breeding, arose not upon that caule & occasion which most men imagine, nor yet from Perseus himself: for the first groundwork thereof was laid by Philip, who if he had lived longer, would have been feen in open action: One thing there was above the rest which stung him, at what time as the Romans imposed conditionsupon him after he was vanquished, to wit, That the Senat laid a bar for to be revenged of those Macedonians who had revolted from him : which he despaired not but it had been posfible to have obtained at their hands, confidering that Quintins in the capitulations of peace re-E served that point entire and excepted not against it. Now afterwards, when Antiochus was defeated in the battel of Thermopple, and that both Philip & the Cof, entred upon the severall exploits; Acilius went in hand to affault Heraclea, and Philip at the same time the City of Lanie, Heraclea was no sooner forced, but Philip had commandment to levy his siege before Lamia, and the town was yielded to the Romans: and this he took to the heart. Howheir the Col appealed his choler for the time, in that making haste in person to Naupattum (unto which town the Ætolians after their rout were retired)he juffered Philip to war upon Athamania and Aminander; to ad joyn also and lay unto his kingdom those Cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Thessalians. Now had Philip chased Aminander out of A hamania, and won certain Cities without any great ado, Demetrias allo (a strong City of great importance, and very commodious for all things) toge-F ther with the nation of the Magnetes he brought under his obedience. After this he forced certain towns in Afia, which were troubled with the feditious variance of their principal and great personages, by reason that they knew not how to use their new liberty, wherewith they had not been acquainted : he won those Cities (I say Jby taking part with those, who in this civill diffention were the weaker, and otherwise would have gone to the walls. By these means the wrath of she King against the Romans was well allaied for the present: nevertheless, he ceased not all the time of peace to bethink how he might gather more strength, and be able to war again, whenfoever any good occasion should be presented unto him. He encreased therefore the revenues of the Crown not only by raising taxes out of all the fruits of the earth, and fetting impost and cufloms upon all merchandile brought into his Realm by featrom forrain parts; but also revived G the rents & effues of the old mines which had discontinued, yea, & in many places ordained new. Moreover, se replenish his country, which by many calamities following war, was dispeopled, he not only took order that his subjects should multiply by forcing them toget, breed, and bring up children; but alfo translated a great multitude of Thracians into Macedony; and for a good time wherein he was in repose and rest from the war, he bent his whole mind, and employed all his fludy bow to make himself great, and augment the pullance of his kingdom. Then old matters and quartels were renewed, which might whet his stomack, and kindle his anger against the Romans. For the complaints which the Theffalians and the Parthobians made fortheir Hi Cities were by him possessed, likewite those grievances which the Empassadors of King Comine. laid abroad touching the Thracian Towns, which he feized and held byforce, were heard winds Romans ; fo as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not But that which moved the Senat most, was this, That they had intelligence how he intended to be Lord of Danie and Me rorea as for the Theffalians, they took lels regard of them, Moreover, there came the Binbaffadors of Athamania, who complained not for the loss of some part of their territory, nor that he en croached upon their frontiers, but that all Athamana full and wholeswas reduced under the unjection and jurisdiction of the King, The banished persons also of Maronea, who had been chiled out of the City by the Kings garriton (for that they flood in defence and maintenance of liberty) made relation, that not only Maronea was in the hands of Philip but the City of Amiralio Like t wife there came Embassadors from Philip, to purge him of all their matters laid to their tharge, who averred, That their King and Mafter had done nothing but by commission and warrant tron the Roman General. They pleaded and alledged, that the case of the Thessalian, Perthodian and Maguefian Cities yea, and the whole nation of Athamania together with Amin ander, was all one with the Ætolians: namely, That after Antiochus the King was chafed and expelled; the Col. himfelf being emploied and occupied in befieging the City of Atolia, fent Philip forto recover the States abovenamed, which being vanquished in war, were now subject unto him. Hereupon the Senat, because they would not determine and set down any thing in the absence of the King, lent three Delegates or Commissioners, to decide these controversies, to wit, Q. Cacilins Metelling M. Babins Tamphilus, and T. Sempronius, Upon whole arrivall, there was published a generall Dieroid all those States that were at difference with the King, to be holden at Tempe in The flat. When they were all fet there in councill, the Roman Legats, as umpiers and judges, the Theffalians, Perrhoebians, and Athamans as plaintiffs and accusers, and Philip as defendant to hear and receive the challenges and acculations against him; the chief Embassadors from the said Cities, pleaded against Philip bitterly or mildly, more or less, according to the several disposition of their hatures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bareto him. Now all the question and debate touching Philippopolis, Tricca, Phaloria, Eurymena, and other towns about them was this Whether those pieces, considering the Ætolians won and feld them by force (& well-known it was that Philiphad raken them from the Etolians) belonged in right to the Theffalians, ot appertained of old time to the Atolians? for Aerlins had granted them un-L to the K. upon thele conditions, namely, it they were any of the apputtenances of the Etolians. and if they combined and took part with the Ætolians willingly of their own accord and not by constraint and force of arms. Upon like terms stood the controverse of the Perrhabian and Magnessan cowns. For the Ætolians had brought a confusion in all their tenures, by reasonthat they held and possessed those Cities, by taking their vantage upon divers occasions. Besides these subflantiall points properly to be decided the Theffalians came in with their complaints allogs For "that those towns (in case they were out of hand delivered unto them, yet) he should render "them spoiled, naked, and desolar. For overand besides those who miscarried by casualty of war, " Philip had carried away into Macedony 500, even the principall flower of their youth, and abu-"fed them like flaves, in putting them to base ministeries & servil drudgeries, and look whatfor w "ver by compulsion he redelivered to the Thessalians, he had taken order afore that they should "be good for nothing. As for example (fay they) Thehes in Phrhia, the only maritime City for "much traffick and merchandise, was in times past gainful and commodious to the Theffalians, " and brought them great revenues and profits. But Philip had turned the staple and all the trade "and negotiation by fea from thence to Demetrius; and having got hulks and hoys, canfed them "to baulk and pass by Thebes and direct their courie for Demetrias Nay, he could not so much as "hold his hands from evill entreating their Embaffadors, who by law of nations are inviolable. " For he forelaied them in ambush as they were in their journey to T. Quintins, By which means "the Theffalians all in general! were fo over-awed by him, and put in fuch fear, that thereis not " a man amongst them date open his mouth, either in their own Cities, or in any of the Diets and N "Councils of the whole nation. For why? their patrons of whom they hold their liberty are far " off, but an imperious Lord they have that fitteth ever on their skirts, and pricketh them conti-" nually in the fides, and will not suffer them to use and enjoy the benefits granted them by the "people of Rome. For take away from them the liberty of speech once, what freedom have they coleft? And even at this present for all the affurance and confidence they have in the priviledge of "Embassadors, they rather figh and groan out their words, than speak frankly, and parley with li-" berty. And unleis the Romans provide better in some good fort, that both the Greeks remain-"ing in Macedony, may be void of fear, and Philip also curbed and kept short for being so bold, it "will be to no purpose at all, that either he was vanghished, or they enfranchised. He is therefore " to be held in with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headstrong and namely horse, Q "that will not be ruled with a gentle fnaffle. Then the Roman Delegats, having heard the reasons and allegations of both parties pronounced sentence, That the Macedonian garrisons should quit the Cities above-E faid, and the Realm of Macedony beconfined within the ancient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complained to have been reciprocally offered from one to another there was a form and course of law to be set down, which should contain a process and manner, how the matters between the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed and composed. Herear the King was highly offended and displeased, but the Delegats went their waies toward Theff alonie a, to wift like wife the Cities of Thrace, and to hear their causes; where the Embaffadors of King Emmenes made a speech so this effect. "If the pleasure of the Romans be, that the two Cities Enus and Maronea shall be free, it is not "for us in modelty to fay any more; but advertise & admonish them to leave the same in reall and "not in serball liberty, and not fuffer agife by them granted to be impeached or intercepted by F " another But if they have less care and confideration of the Gities and States planted in Thrace, " yes moremeet and reason it is that those places which sometimes were subject unto Antiochus, "Thouldfall to Euments tasher shanto Philips by way of recompence for war-lervice, in regard "as well of the merits of his father Antoloridusing the war against Philip, as of his own deferts, "who during the war with Amischus, was personally present in all travels & dangers both by sea "and land And to the niffact, he hath bendes an award of the ten Delegats passed already before-" hand, who in the grapt and donation of Chenfonne fat & Lyfimachia, have no doubt given Ma-"rome a & a zerus likewise an be as dependants of a greater girt, considering the near vicinity and "neighborhood of those oaher Cities, For, as concerning Philip, what hath he deserved at the "hands of the people of Rome? To these challenges Philip began far otherwise, than he did of late against the Thessall-The Oration ans and Perrhoebians, and in this wife he spake: "I have, quoth he, no matter to debate either of King Philip. "with the Maronits or Eumenes; but now at this present I am to contest even with you my Ma-"fers of Rome) at whose hands I have seen thus long that I can obtain no reason and equity I " thought it meet and right, that the Macedonian Cities, which had revolted from medicing the "time of truce, should be rendred again unto me: not for any great encrease of seignory that "thereby should have accrued unto my kingdom (for small towns they are god wot, and situation-" on the utmolt frontiers) but because their precedent and example might have imported much "to retain the rest of the Macedonians in their duty and alleageance. No fulpition was there at Rome of a Macedonian war L. Na. I as the Pro Conful was returned out of Spain: and when he demanded a tritimph of the Senat affembled in the Temple of Bellowd. the same in regard of his noble and worthy exploits might have been obtained, but for example fake it was not granted. For an order it was in Ring, by ancient cultome of their forefathers. that no man might triumph; who brought nothis army back with him unless he left unto his fireceffour the Province fully fubdued and ferled in peace. Howbeit, Maulins was allowed an indiffen rent honour, namely, to enter into the City by way of Ovation. In which folemnity he had born before him in a pompous pageant two and hity coroners of gold. Moreover, in gold a hundred thirty two pound weight, and in filvering thousand three hundred. Also, he pronounced aloud in the Senat, that Q. Fabius the Questor was coming, and brought with him ten thousand pound weight more of filver, and eighty of gold, which he meant likewile to bring into the Chamber of the City.

That year a great commotion and inforrection there was of bondflaves in Apula, L. Political mins the Prator had the government of Tarentum, and he fat in inquifition upon a damned crew of certain herdmen and grafiers, who had compired together, and med to rob by the high-way fide. and in the common pastures belonging to the City; which Commission he followed with C fuch severity and rigor, that he condemned 7000 of them. Many et aped and fled, but many were executed and inffered death. As for the Coff long were they kept in the City of Rome, about the levy of fouldiers, but at length they went into their Provinces.

The same year, C. Calphurnius and L. Quintius the Prators in Sp.in, having in the beginning of the Spring led forth their armies out of their wintring holds, and joyned their forces together in Beturia, advanced forward into Carpatain, (where the enemies were encamped) with a refolution to manage and conduct the war with one joint mind and common council together. Not far from the Cities Hippon and Tolerum, there began a skirmish between the forragers of both parts. that were gone forth to make provision: seconded they were from the one camp and the other. by means whereof, the whole armies of both fides by little and little, came forth into the field to Thrike a full battel. In this tumultuary skirmish the enemies had the vantage, as well of the ground wherein they were embattelled as of the manner of fight and fervice. By reason whereof, both the Roman armies were discomfitted and driven back into their camp; but the enemies pressed not upon them not withstanding they were put in great fright and much disordered. The Roman Prators doubting lest their camp the morrow after should be assailed, dislodged in the night between ingreat fecret and filence, withour any found of trumper, and departed, In the morning by break of day, the Spaniards in ordinance of battell approached the trench and rampier: and being entired within the camp (which they found void and empty beyond their hope and expectation on they rifled and ranfacked all that the Romans left behind them, whiles they made hatte away in the might feason: from whence the enemies returned to their own camp, and there for certain daies abode in flanding leaguer and flirred not. In that battell and in the chafe together, there were flain of Romans and allies 5000: and with the spoiles of their bodies, the enemies armed themselves: from thence they marched to the river Tagus. The Roman Prators in the mean least fon employed all that time to levy and affemble new forces out of the Confederat Cities of Spain. and in comforting and encour ging the hearts of their own fouldiers after their fright, upon this adverte conflict and unlusky foil. Now when they had gathered (as they thought) a fufficient. power, and took themselves strong enough, and that the souldiers also defired to be doing with the enemy, for to rate out and cancell the former ignomy and difgrace, they encamped twelve miles from the river Tagus aforefaid: and about the third watch of the night advanced their standards, and marching in a four square battell, by day light they were come to the bank of the F river (now were the enemies lodged upon a little mount beyond the water :) and incontinently in two places (where the river shewed's foord) they waded through with their arms, Calphurnius on the right hand, and Quintius on the left. "All this while the enemies continued quiet and movod not: but in the mean time, while as they wondred at their fudden coming, and devited how to trouble and diforder the fouldiers as they from d make halte to pais the river, the Romans had trapported over themselves, and their bag and baggage also yea, and brought all together into one place. And became they perceived by this time the enemy to flir and remove, and had not time to fortifie their camp, they put themselves in battell array. In the midit stood the fills below of Caphinnias, and the eight of Caprinis, which was the very flower and strength of the whole army. Now they had a fair open plain all the way between them and the enemies camp. So as there was no cause to fear any amount. The Confuls having finished the levy of fouldiers, and accomplished all things requisite to be done in Rome, led the army to these Province of Liquits. Sempronise departed from Pile, and made a journey against the Appan Liquitans where by walling their territories and burning their towns and fortreiles, he made way into the first end opened the passages as far as to the runs. Macra and the port of Luna. The enemies took a certain mount (an ancient hold) where their ancellots lometimes had leated themselves : but from thence they were by force differed by reafon that the Romans overcame the distributes of the avenues thereto. An Claudin likewite for bis part, was equal in smoor and good fortune to his Collegue, as having lought certain profes N rous battels with the Ligurian Inguames. He forced besides in towns of theirs, and took in my thoulands of priloners within them. Of the chief authors of that rebellion, he canfed three and forty to lose their heads.

Now approached the time of the folemo affembly for election of Magifrats at Rome and abeit Sempranius his lot it was to hold the faid affembly yet Gunde's returned but to Rome, because P. Claudius his brother made fuit to be Conful, he had for his competitors, Le Employ a February us Lahen, and Servius Sulptius Galba; all four of the Nobility. Old (nitoes they were all and her capile they had inffered the repulle atopetime, they repewed the fair for this diggity, as being for callettey has uncreditine repulse atopering, they repeated the tax for this digning, as news in much the rather due, because it had, been one granted them. Now men thought verily without any dopling and the continuous part of the place. Fabius Labera and Suffricient to the Common to Common the Common that the Common that the Common that the Common that the Common that the Common the Common that the Common A together with his brother bestirred himselfand without his tishers attending upon him travelled and laboured hard in all parts of the common place : notwithstanding the adversaries wer and the most of the Senators cried out upon him, and faid, That he ought to consider and remember rather that he was the Cof. of the people of Rome, than brother to P. Claudius; why then fat he not fill in the Tribunal either as prefident and judge of the court affembled, or elfe as a beholder and spectator only, without saying anyword himself? Howbeit, he could not possibly be reclaimed from this difordinate affection of his which he thewed in labouring for his brother. This election on was divers times also troubled with the great debates and contentions caused by the Tribune of the Commons : whiles some of them spake against the Cos others again maintained his surrand took part with him, But in the end, Fabins took the foil, and Appins went away with the game for R his brother. So P. Claudius Pulcher was created Col, beyond his own hope, and more than others looked for. L. Porcius Licinius held his own, and obtained the lecond place in his course; forthat the Commoners went moderatly to work, & shewed nor so much affection and forcible means as Claudius did. After this, was holden the election of Prators. And chosen there were, C. Dearning Flavus, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Crobegus, Q. Navius Matho, C. Sempronius Blafus, and A. Terentius Varro. Thus much concerning the acts archieved both at home in the City, and abroad in the war, that year wherein App. Chandiar and M. Sempronius were Confuls.

In the beginning of the next year, in which P. Claudius and L. Portius bare the Confoling when as Q. Cacilius, M. Babius and T. Sempronius who had been fent to hear and decide the controversies between the two Kings. Philip and Eumenes, and the States of The flaty) had friade re-C nort of their embassages; they permitted likewise the Embassadors of the said Princes and Ciries to enter into the Senat. Who related the felf-fame things again, which had been alledged before in the presence of the foresaid Legats in Gnerce. After this, the LL of the Senaraddressed another new embassage into Macedony and Greece whereof App Claudius was the chief for to vint and fee! whether the Cities adjudged and affigued to the Rhodians, Theffalians, and Perrhabians were delivered unto them accordingly. They also had in charge to cause the garrisons to quit England Maronea, and to look that all the fea-coast of Thracia, were freed from the subjection of Philip and the Macedonians. They were enjoyeed moreover to go into Pelopoinellos, from whence the former embaffie was departed in more doubtfull terms than if they had never gone thither. For the ver and belides other things they were fent away without any aniwer for their dispatche and ap-D beit they requested the Achaens for to assemble their generall Diet; they might not obtain in Frie which, when as Q. Cacilins found himself discontented and grievonly complained and the Lacedzmonians withall made pitious moan, that the walls of their City were demolished and rated their common people lead away in captivity into. Aches, and there fold, and the laws of Lycurous taken from them under which their City and Common-weal until that day had been maintained and governed: the Achaans excused themselves most of all for the imputation of refusing to hold a

Council; and to that purpose they rehearded a Law and Ordinances whereby they were forbidden expressely to call and publish a Diet, unless it were in the case of levying war and contraction of peace, upon occasion that any embasiadors came directly unto them from the Senat of Rhad with letters, or commission in writing. But for that this manner of excuse should not leave their g turn again afterwards, the Senat gave them plainly to understand, that they dught to take eare and order that the Roman Embaliadors might at all times have mesus of free accels to these Councils, like as they also reciprocally should have a Senat held for their sakes; as often as they

After these embassages were departed, Philip was advertised by his Embassadors, that there was no remedy but he must abandon those Cities, and withdraw his garrisons: and herewith being mightily offended & angred against all, yet he discharged his choler only upon the Maronits Unto Onomastus, warden of the ports and seascoasts, he gave commandment to kill the chief of the adversepart. And he by the means of Cassander, one of the Kings supposts and favorits who a long time had dwelt in Maronea procured certain Thracians to be levinto the town by night Schoole F he committed murder and maffacre, as if it had been a City won by force of arms. And when the Roman embaffadors made complaint to him, namely of such outrages committed to cruelly against the guiltles Maronits, and so proudly and insolently against the people of Rome; in that they should be killed and cut in peeces as enemies, unto whom the Senat had ordained restitution of their freedom he made answer and said, that weither himself, nor any of those who belonged unto him, could do withall: but it was long of themselves and their variance one with another; whiles some of the Citizens drew to him, and others enclined to King Eumenes. Which ye may (qd.he)foon know to be a truth, if ye will but ask the Maronits themselves: for this account he made, that whiles they were all terrified with so late and fresh a massacre, there durst not one of them open his mouth against him. Appins replied again, and faid, That they were not to make G an enquiry in this fo evident and notorious a fact, asific were in any respect doubtfull: but if he would discharge and clear himself as innocent of the action, he should send to Rome Onemastus and Cassander, who were named to have committed the outrage, that the Senat might examine them upon interrogatories. This word at the first so troubled and dashed the King that his colour went and came in his face, & he knew not how to keep his countenance. But after he was come again to himself, he made answer, That (if they needs would) he cared not much to send Caffander, for that he had dwelt & continued in Maronea, but as for Onomastus, who neither was at Maronea, nor fo much as in any quarter near auto is how possibly could be be charged or touched with the H matter? Now as he spared Onomastus the sather of the twelling and was loath to have him come in assession, as being his more dear and honourable friends for he feared him much more than the other, left he should bewray and disclose the thing stofor that himself had conferred with him shereshout gand befides, he had ferred bisaura discremines as a Minifer to execute, and hen pravy unto him as a complice to plot fuch like defiguments, Caff ander alfo, as it is verily thought. was solioned and made away, by certain that werte feat of puspofeto accompany him through Enranto the fea fide; and all because the villany should not be detected and come to light. Thus the Legass departed from the parky and conference with Philip, as shewing in their countemanage that they were nothing well pleated : and Philip on the other fide went his waite as refohere to levy wanagain : but forafmuchas his forces as yet were not fufficient to do any exploit, ! and because he would delay the time between he determined to send his younger ton Demetring to Romes both to purge his father of those matters wherewith he was charged, and also by humble request to appeare the anger of the Senat; supposing, that this young gentleman, who had been left as an holiege at Rome, and these had the wed a good tellimony of a Princely nature and tovalled monition, might much availin the cause. In the mean while himself under colour of aiding the Bizantins, but in very truth to firike some remour into the Princes of Thrace, made an expedition against them : and when he had in one barrell discomfitted them, and taken prifoner theis chief Captain Amadorus, he respired into Macedony, having fent certain messengers to follicie the batharous nations, inhabising near the river there for to enter and invade Italy, In Pelapositionallo the coming of the Roman Legats was expected who by this commission were enjoyand so pals out of Manadony into Mehaat against whom because the Achaans would not be to feels what to lay Legorem their Pracor fummoned a publike Council aforehand. In which there was parly as touching the Lacedemonians, namely, how that of enemies they were become informers and accusers, and danger it was, left when they were vanquished they would be more to be feared, than all the time that they waged was Fordering the wars the Achaens found the Romans to be their good affociats, but now the fame Romans are more friendly to the Lacedamomans, thank a the Asheans, lecting thet Areas and Altibiades (banifhed persons both out of Lacedement, and by the means of the Achaens reflored again to their place) had undertaken to go in emballage to Rente 1 against the Achazannation, which had so well deserved at their hands; and these game to hard language against them as if they had been chaled and driven out of their coun-L. try and not religiosat thepeunco by obemin Hereupon acole a great outcry from all patts of the affemilibian to put to suction, what findibbe determined expressely of them by mane; and in this fire, where all wears by choles, and nothing by counsel condemned they were to die, Some few daigsaleer came the Roman Embasikdors, for whose take a Council was holden at Citiereja Citwill dooadia But before any matter was treated on the Acharas were furprised with exceeding idask confidence and thinking how this deciding of matters was not like to be managed and carzigd wish any indifferency for sheir behoofs for afmuch as they faw Affens & Alcibiades Condemned by shem in the left Councill koobe in the company of the faid Embaffidors and no man durit aben his lips and peat a word. In the beginning of this year (when at Rome they had fitten in confultation about the Provinces of Confuls and Pretors) Ligaria was affigued unto the Confuls for their charge and government. because there was no war in any other place. Then the Pretors cast lots for theirs. To C. Decimina Flavor fell the jurisdiction of the City: and to P. Cornelius Cethegus that other between citizens and forrainers: C. Sempronius had the government of Sicily, and Q. Navius Matho of Saidinia; with commission also to fit upon the inquisition in case of poisoning. A. Terentius Varro was deputed L. Governor of high Spain, and P. Sempronius Longus of the low. Out of those 2 Provinces it sell out for that there came much about the same time two Lieurenants, L. Juventius Talva and T. K Quintilius Varus; who having related before the Senat how great a war was now dispatched and finished in Spain, required with al, that there should be rendred praise and thanks to the immortal Gods for the happy success in the wars and likewise that the Pretors might be permitted to bring away their armies. So there was a folemn procession ordained to be holden two dayes: but as touching the reducing of the armies they gave order to refer it wholly to be debated, at what time as there should be qualifion about the armies of Consuls and Pretors together. Some sew dayes after it was ordained that the Confuls should have with them into Liguria two legions areece: which Ap, Claudius and M. Sempronius had the conduct of, As touching the Spanish forces, great contention there was between the new Pretors and the friends of Copurnius and Quantius in their absence. Both sides had Tribuns and both had Consuls to take part with them, The Tribuns I. Threatned to cross the act of the Senat if they ordained that the armies should be brought home. The Confine again protefled, that if the Tribuns thus opposed their negative, they would not fuffer any other decree and ordinance to pais. In conclusion, the respect of those that were absent; was of less importance; and an act of the Senat was entred. That the Pretors should entel 4000 footmen of Romans and 400 horiemen: likewise 5000 foot and as many horse of Latine allies to conduct with them into Spain. And when they had thus enrolled their four full legions, look what furplulage there remained over and above 3000 food and 300 horse in a legion, they should give them their congie and dismisschem of fouldiery ; first; as many as had served our their full time, and then those who had born themselves most valiantly in the war under Calpurnius and Quin-

After this debate and variance was appealed, there arole another in the neck of it, occasioned by the death of P. Decimius the Pretor, Cn. Licinius and L. Puppins (who had been Ediles the laft year before likewise (. Valorius the Flamin of Jupiter, and Q. Fulvius Flacous, labouted to be in his room late dereased. As for the left of these rehearsed (because he was Edile Curule) he thewed not himselfin his white robe; but he made more means and laboured above all the reft, having to his adversary and concurrent the Flamin above said. At the first he seemed equal only ento him in the fuir, but afterwards when he began to have the better of him, certain Tribuns of the Commons flood upon this point; and alledged, That his name wagnot to be accepted as eligible; for that one and the felf same person might neither take nor exercise at one time, the fun-Prion of two Magifiracies; and namely, both Curule or of State. Others againfaid, that it was M intervand reason that he were dispensed with and exempt from the Laws in that behalf to the end, that the people might be at liberey to dect whom they would for Pretor, L. world faw not, that after he were declared and pronounced Pretor, he would incontinently refign up the Ædilethip. The Comul perceiving both him fully resolute and let upon a pitch in the fuir, and also the favor and affection of the people enclined more and more roward him, brake up the affembly aforelaid, and called a Senat: where, in a frequent leftion of Senators it was ordained. That for as much as Flaceus was little or nothing moved with the authority of the LL. of that honorable court, he was to be dealt withal in a general affembly before the body of the people. When the people were met together at the lummons of the Conful, he proposed the matter unto him before them. Flaceus relented never a jot, but perfifted (till in his opinion, and gave the people of Rome thanks for their favour, in that they thewed themselves willing to elect him Pretor. Bio often as they had time and place wherein they might testily and declare their love to him: which affectionate kindnels of his fellow citizens, he never meant to reject and abandon. This conflant and resolute speech of his, kindled and enflamed so great love and affection in them toward him, that past all peradventure he had been chosen Pretor out of hand, in case the Consul would have received his name. Much firite and debate there was amongst the Tribuns. one against another; yea, and between them and the Conful, until at length the Conful held a Senat, and there a decree passed in this wife, That forasmuch as the wilfull stub borness of Q. Flacous of one side, and the inordinat affection of men on another fide, was fuch, as the folemn affembly for inbelecting of a Pretor in the place of the deceased, could not be holden according to the laws, the Senat agreed and resolved, that there were already Pretors enough, and P. Cornelius should administer and execute both jurisdictions in the City, and exhibit the playes and games in the honour of

After this troublesome debate about the election, was by the sage wildome and valorous courage of the Senat suppressed, there arose anothersar greater, by how much the thing was of weightier importance, and the perions agents therein more in number, and for quality and place mightier. There flood in election to be Centors (and that with earnest endeavour and exceeding heat of contention) L. Valerius Flaccus, P.and L. both Scipios; Cn. Manlius Volfo, and L. Furius Purpureo, all Parriei, And of commoners, M. Porcius Cato, M. Fulvius Nobilior, T. and Marcus both Sempronis, the one furnamed Longus, the other Tuditanus. But M. Porcius over-went them all by many degrees, as well those of the Patricians as also of the commons, not withstanding they were n come of most noble families. This man carried with him so vigorous a spirit and pregnant wit, that The commendation howfoever he were born and descended, it seemed he was able to make way of himself to advancement and honour. He wanted no Art and skill meet and requisit for the managing either of Porting Cate. private busines of his own, or publick affairs of flate: cunning he was in country husbandry, as well as in civil policy. Some are advanced to the highest dignities and most honourable places, by their deep knowledge in the law; others attain to promotion by eloquence and there be again, who have rifen and become great through martial prowefs and feats of arms. But this man was by nature for rainable and pliant to all alike, that what foever he addicted and gave himself unto, a man would have faid, he had been born and framed even from his mothers womb to it and to nothing elle. Neither carried he himself so, that his congue flourished only whiles he fived as leaving no monument behind him of his singular eloquence: but it liveth, nay, it flourisheth still, immortalized as it were and recommended to posterity in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extrant many, which he penned and pronounced as well in his own cause as for the desence of his friends yea, and invectives also against others: for able he was to but down and weary his adverfaries, not only by declaiming and accufing them, biff also by pleading his own cause. Factious quarrels and enmittes there were exceeding many that commenced from ; and he placed others with as many : and hard it is to lay or fee is down, whether he were nized and preffed apon by the nobility, or himfelf coursed and baited them more. Doubtless by nature he was auffere and rigorous, his speech was sharp biting, and beyoud mealing their and free burthe carried a mind with him that stooped to no defires and lusts whatfoever: his file to fevere and precife; as it was encouched and without all foot of blame: despifing all fawbing favours; and contemning earthly riches. In this and frugality, in sobriety, in parience in followince of the fill and danger, his body was feel to the very back. And as for his mind and courage, it was fuch as very age and time (which abateth and confometh all things elfe) was not able to break and dathit : when he was fourfcore years old and fix, he pleaded at the bar for others: he hisde orations for his own defence, and wrote books : and in the nintieth year of his age he convented Servine Oatha before the people to receive his judgment by them. For even then, whiles he laboured and fued for the place, he used minatory freeches, and gave out, that they only were opposed against him, who seared they should have Cenforship sharply exercised without partiality and respect of persons. And herewith he maintained and upheld the fuit of L. Valerius with him faying that if he had but him of all others to be his colleague, he should be able to repress the wicked enormities newly come up and rife in the City, and to bring in request again the ancient manners and fashions of the old world. Men were much moved in these respects and considerations; and so mangre the heads of the nobility, they not only created him Cenfor, but also adjoyned unto him L. Valerius for his companion in that go-

After the election of Cenfors was ended, the Confuls and Pretors took their journies into their feveral Provinces, alliave Q. Navius; who before that he could go into Sardinia, was flaied behind no less than four months, about certain inquisitions of poisoning: whereof, he sate upon manv without the City of Rome, in corporate burroughs, market Towns and places of great refort, for that he thought that manner of proceeding more convenient. And if we lift to believe V. Antias, he condemned two thousand persons.

Semblably, L. Postbumius the Pretor, (unto whom the government of Tarentum by lot fell) did good justice upon great conspiracies made by certain gratiers; and with great care and diligence followed the enquest of the Bacchanals, and dispatched the reliques thereof quite and clean. Cornelius;

In the farther part of Spain all was quiet, by reason that the Lustrans were in the last war subdued : but inthe hither patt, A. Terentius forced Corbso a Town of the Suessetans, which he assaulted with mantilets and other fabricks of war, and fold all the prisoners: which done, he passed the winter peaceably in that higher part of Spain alfo,

The old Pretors, C. Calpurnius Piso and L. Qinitius returned to Rome; and both of them were with great accord and content of the LL, of the Senat allowed to triumph. And first C. Calparnius triumphed over the Portugais and Celtiberians. In which triumph, he carried in thew 83 coronets of gold, and 12000 pound of filver. Within few dayes after, L. Quintius triumphed over the same Portugals and Celtiberians. In which solemnity, there was represented in shew, as much gold and filver as in the former.

The Ceniors, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, whiles men hung in suspence between fear and hope what they would do, he d a review and a new choice of the Senate. Seven Senators they displaced and depoted from that dignity: amongst whom, there was one of mark, for his nobility of birth and honorable offices which he had born, namely, L. Quinius Flaminina, who had been Conful. An ancient order (they fay) it was in time of our fore-fathers, That when the Cenfors had put any out of the Senat, they should note them directly for those faults which they had committed: and at this day, extant there be divers tharp orations of Care, against them whom either he casted and displaced out of Sense, or from whom be rook away horses of service: but of all others, the fourer and bitterest is that of his, against this, L. Quinting; which if he had pronounced as an accuser before he had noted him with that disgrace, and not as Censor after the said note, his very own brother T. Quintus (if he had been then Cenfor) could not possibly have kept L, Quintus in the state of a Senator. Among other grievous marters, he articled against him, That he had trained with him from Rome into his Province of France (in hope of many great rewards) * This Philip I one * Philippus Panue, a notorious and coffly Ganymede, This boy, as he was footing and playing take to be no the wanton with the faid Quinting then Conful, uled to upbraid him with this, That he was had Carthaginian, away from Rome, against the very time that the shew of sword-players at utretance was tobe exhibited: and this he faid, to shew how ready he was to fatisfy the pleasure of him his lover, Now it chanced as they were making good cheer together, and having taken their wing liberally M were well heat the ewith, news came and reported to was in the banker time. That a certain noble man of the Boians was arrived, with his children, as a renegat from the adverte part, and was defirous to fpeak with the Confusior to have affarance from his mouth of fales conduct who being brought into the pavilion began to parly with the Conful by a truchman or interpreter. And in the mids of his speech; How failt thou (quoth Quierine to that want or detry, his Catamite) because thou half missed and lost the fight of those sword players at Rome, wilt thou see prefently here this Frenchman die in the place before? He made not any great femblance unto him in good earnest of his defire, that way: but the Copiul at the first beauty fish and baggage. caught the naked fword which hung over his head, and first gave the poor Gaul a wound in his sconce as he was speaking unto him, and afterwards as he made (hit to file from him, and called o upon the protection of the people of Rome, and the affiliance of the ethal, were prefent, Quinting ran him quite through the fides, Valerius, Ansias on ho never had read the oration of Care, but gave credit to a flying fable only without any head or author tellesh the sale with long other circumstance howheir much like in substance of marrer, as concluing his lecherous sust and bloody cruelty.

A anto her among other discountes he recounted with what rigor he had followed certain inquiftions : what a number of priloners he had in irons condemned to death ; and how many of their heads he minded to chop off. Then this harlotry fitting next beneath him, aid, That the had never in all her life feen any man to cut ones head off, and it was a fight that of all other the would faint fee. Wherupon, this kind amorous knight to gratify the quean, cauled one of thole poor fouls condemned to die, to befer out of prilon into the banketting room, and prefently to be beheaded before her face, A cruel fact it was & inhuman whether it were committed as Cate hath objected in his Oration, oras Vatreim hath written in his flory, that any human creature should be thus maffacred like a facrifice, and the table beforinkled with his blood, amid the cups standing full of wine and the diffies furnished with viands, where and when the manner and cultome was to cast R and take the first essay in the honor of the Gods, and that devoutly with grace and good prayers; and all to content and feed the eye of a wanton and shameless Harlot, lying in the bosome of the Conful. In the end of Cate his Oration, this condition was offered unto Quinting, That if he would plead unguilty, and deny this fact and others which he charged him with, then he should put in a real caution, and stand to his defence and trial : but if he confessed himself guilty then he willed him to consider whether he thought any man would grieve and be forry at the ignominie which he was to receive, who being transported beside his understanding with wine and women, made but a sport and pastime to shed mens blood at a very banker. In taking a review of the Cavalry or Gentlemen of Rome, L. Scipio Afiaticus had his great horle of service taken from him. This Cenforship was likewise executed with severity and rigor to all forts and degrees, and namely, in C the prising and valuation of their goods. For Cate commanded the Sergeants to take a note of all the ornaments, jewels, and apparrel of women, also of their chariots and coaches if they amounted to the fum of a 5000 affes, and to enrol the fame in the Cenfors book, Item, all bondflaves under twenty years of age, fold after the last tax or assessment for 10000 Asses or upward, that they should be valued at an higher price by ten fold than they were effeemed worth: and that for all these things they should pay and contribute to the City chamber after three in the thousand. These Censors cut off all water either running out of any common stream into a privat house, or derived into particular fields and grounds. And all houses either built by private persons upon common ground, or any wayes encroaching and leaning to publike places they caused to be demolished and pulled down within thirty dayes. After this, they set out divers peeces of work to h be wrought at a price, of that money which was ordained to that purpole, namely, to pave certain pools with flone to scoure the draughts and finks where need was: and in the mount Aventime and other parts where none were already to make new. And particularly of themselves Flaccase cansed the causey or wharfto be made against the waters called Neptunia, that the people might pale to and fto that way: and also a fireet-way through Formianum, And Cato for his part butte two galleries, " Manium and Titium, in the Mineries; and bought four shops for the City: he built there also the stately Hall or Palace called Porcia. As for the City revenues, they did let * Laumin. and let thereforth to farmers at an exceeding racked rent : but all the City works they put out to undertakers by the great, at as low a reckoning as they could. These leases and bargains aforesaid. being once caricelled by order from the Senat, and new made at the importunat fuit and that with E outcries and reass of the Publicans as well farmers as undertakers; then the Cenfors by proclamation commanded those to avoid far from the subhastation, who had disanulled the former leases. and bargains, and with some little abatement and easing of the former rents, they demised the same profits and revenues again to others. This was a centorship of great note, full of rapine, ill will, and heart-burning, which croubled and molefted M. Porcius as long as he had a day to live, for that he was reputed and held to be the author of that leverity and rigor exercised therin.

The fame year two Colonies were crected and inhabitants fent from Rome, to wit, Pollentia into the Picene territory, and Pifaurum into the Gauls country, Six acres of land were affigned to every one of the coloners, And the same Triumvirs, namely, Q. Fabius Laben, M. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q.F. Molin Nobilior, were they that both parted the faid lands, and also had the leading and plan-I ting of the forefaid Colonies.

The Confuls that year atchieved no memorable exploit at all, neithet at home in City, nor abroad in war. Against the year following they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabio. ms, who upon the fifteenth of March, on which day they entred into their government, put to question as concerning the Provinces, as well their own as the Pretors. For there had been choien Pretors C. Valerius the Flamin of Impirer (who also the year before was in election for the place) Sp. Posthumius Albinus and P. Cornelius Sifonna, also L. Puppius, L. Inline, and Cn. Sicinius, Unto the Confuls was affigued the province Ligaria, together with the charge of the lame armies, which P. Claudius and M. Poreius had conducted. As for both the Provinces in Spain [as well beyoud as on this fide Iberm | they were referred with their ordinary forces, for the Pretors, of the. G former year by special commission without casting any lots at all therefore. The new Presors were enjoyhed for to dispose and part their governments, that C. Valerius the Flamin of Impiter might, exercite one of the jurisdictions of Rome, So he was L. chief juftice for the forrainers, and Sifenna Cornelius over the citizens Unto Sp. Pofthamine fell Sicily to L. Huppins Apaliasto L. Inline Galles, and to Con Steining Sardinia. As for L. Lutho be was enjoined to make halvand let forward on his. fourneysforthe Transapin Gauls (boyons the mountains) had paffed over by the fireights of the. toriells and wines unknown beforetime, into Italy, as hath been beforefaid, and were building them, Pofthumius Albinus was created in the room of Cn. Cornelius Lemulus late deceased, But in the beginning of this prefent year P. Licinius Craffus the arch Pointify departed out of this world. in whose place M, Sempronius Tudiranus was invested for the Bishop, But C. Servilous Geminus was created the arch-prelat or high-priest afortaid, In the honor of P. Licinius at his funerals, there was given a dole of flesh and a shew exhibited of 120 sword-feniers fighting at sharp: likewise there were represented funeral plaies and games, which continued three dayes; and after that followity, I a feast was holden during which, when the tables were let & spred accordingly all over thegrandplace of the City, suddainly there arole a tempelt with great florms, which forced most mento erect tents and booths there: but after a while when the weather was fair again, they were taken down and had away: and men commonly gave out and faid, That wheras the Prophets & wilards had forecold among other their fatal prefages that they should be forced to quarter & pitch tents in the market place of Rome; now that prophesie was fulfilled, and they were freed and excused from farther danger. And no sooner were they eased and delivered of that scruple, but they were troubled with another; for that it had rained blood two daies in the court-yard of Vulcan: and the Decemvirs published a solemn supplication for the expiation of that predigious sen-

Before that the Confuls departed into their provinces they brought into the Senat for to have & audience, the embassiges come from beyond Sea. And never before that day were so many men of those forrain parts seen at Rome. For from the time that the bruit was blown abroad amongst the nations bordering upon Macedony, that the Romans gave no deafear to the complaints and acculations commented against Philip, and that many had sped well by complaining severy City and State in their own behalf, yea, and many privat perfons in particular (for an ill neighbour he was to them all) repaired to Rome, in hope either to be righted and eafed of their wrongs, orto dilcharge their flomacks and be moned and comforted for their miferies. Likewife from King Enmenes there arrived an embaffage accompanied with his own brother Athenaus to make complaint, as finding themselves grieved that the garrisons were not withdrawn out of Thracia; as alto to inform that Phile had fent certain aids into Bithynia to Prafits who made war upon Enmener. Now Demetrius (Philip his son) at that time a very yong Gentleman, was to answer to all. these challenges: and an easy peece of work it was not, either to bear in mind all the matters objected, or to think upon the points of every answer accordingly. For over and besides that the arcicles were many in number most of them were of very small consequence and importance in mely, firife about limits and land-marks, about carying away men and ravishing women; of driving of cartel, of ministring justice partially and with affection of else of none ministred at all: of sentences given and judgments palled in causes either by force or for favour. The Senat perceiving that neither Demerrius could speak to these points and give them good evidence, nor themselves be well informed and cleer ly inflructed by him; being moved also and grieved to see the youth so raw a scholer in the e affairs, and therwith much troubled inspirit, gave order to enquire and de- Me mand of him. Whether he had received any notes in writing from his father as touching the premisses? And when he answered and said, Yea, they thought the first and principal thing for them to do was to fee and hear what were the aniwers of the King to every specialty and particular. And thereupon they prefently called for that book of his fathers, and then permitted him to read the contents therof. Now therein were fet down certain brief abstracts of pleas and defenses to each feveral point; shewing Imprimis, that some things he had done according to the decrees & awards of the Roman Delegats and commissioners, Item, Wheras he had left forth hat undone, the default was not in him but in the very parties that accused him. He had interlaced between certain grievar ces and complaints as touching the iniquity and hard penning of those decrees and how matters were not scanned and debated before Cacilius with that indifferency and equity as was meet N and requific and namely that without defert of his part; all men were fet against him and insulted over him. The Senat collected hereby good arguments, how the heart of Philip was wounded and galled against the Romans. But when the yong Prince excused some of these matters, and for the reft promifed and underrook, that all should be done to the uttermoff as it pleased the Senatto order and let down; then it was thought good to deliver this answer unto him, That his father had in nothing done better nor more to the contentment of the Senae than that he feemed willing (howfoever matters were paffed already) to make fatisfaction to the Romans by the means of his fon Demetrius. As for the Senat, they could diffemble forget put up and endure many things done and past ; yea, and were perswaded verily in their hearts, that they might believe and trust Dimeerius: as knowing affuredly, that although they fent his body again to his father Philip, yet they had o his heart and affection with them fill, as a fure pledge and hoffage; and that he was a friend to the people of Rome, to far forth as his reverent duty to his father would permit and give him leavederting him withal to understand, that forto do him honor, they would fend Embassadors into Macedon; to the end that if ought had not been so fully effectuated as it should have been, it might be done yet in good time, without imputation of fault and blame; or poenal fatisfaction to be made for any thing hitherto omitted: yea, and defirous they were, that Philip should understand that by the mediation of Demoritar and for his take, the stood yes in good terms of peace and friendship the meditation of the construction of the cons and overtheore, and an analysis admitted to audience in the Senate. They moved many petry matters and trilling controverfies; but those theoprincipally touched the main point weretheres to wir. Whether they flouid be reflored again, whom the Achteans had condemned or not Bens Whether they were justly of unjustly killed whom they murdered? Moreover, they put to question Whether the Lacedamonians were to be comprised within the general affembly and Councel of Achea; or, that this State (as before timed) should have their rights and franchites apart by

Bthemselves from all others in Peloponne fue? The Senar ordained and awarded imprimis, That they should be restored. Item, That the sentences pronounced against them, should be reversed liens That Lacedamon should do service to that high court and publick Diet of Aches: and finally that this accord and award should be engrossed, subscribed, and signed as well by the Lacedæmonians as Achæans.

Q. Martin was fent Emballador into Macedony: who also had direction and order given him by the same commission, to visit the state of the allies in Peloponnesse: for there also remained some troubles after the old quarrels and variance; yea, and the Messenians resused to appear at the general councel of Achea, Now if I would fet in hand to record the causes and circumstances of that war, I should forget my purpose in the beginning of my work, wherein I resolved not to touch at C all any discourse of forain histories, no farther than they were linked to the Roman affairs. How beit one memorable occurence there hapned, which I cannot pass by namely, that albeit the Achae ans had the better hand in war, yet it chanced that Philopamen their Pretor was taken prisoner by the Messenishs, as he made an expedition to seize upon (orone by pravention, which the enemies were defirous to be mafters of. Surprifed he was in a valley of great disadvantage, and some few horsmen with him, It is reported, that by the help of the Thracians and Candiots, he might have fled and escaped: but for very shame to abandon those men of arms, which were the noblest Gentlemen of that nation, & whom he lately had made choice of the had not the power to do otherwife, but stay to fee the last. For whiles he came himself behind in the rereward, because he was defirous to make means for their evalion through the fireights of that pass, and to that purpose va-D liantly received the charge of the enemies, his horse sell and cast him at once; so as with his own fall and his horselving upon him he had like to have gone away in a swoon: a mannow threescore years old and ten; and withal, newly crept abroad and recovered of a long and lingering difeales. which had mightily wasted and confirmed the fixength of his body. Well, thus lay he along, and the enemies ran over him; and fo fcon as they knew, who he was, they reared him upon his feet from under his horse, no less respective than if he had been their own General in regard of a reverence they bare unto the man, and in remembrance of his noble exploits: they brought him again to himfelf, and forth of that by-valley flanding out of the pais, they carried him into the high way : and were fo far possessed and overcome with joy so unexpected that they could not well believe their own eyes that they had gotten him. Some dispatched van-courners to Meffane With the news : B. hereof : namely, that the war was brought to an end, confidering that Philopamen was taken and was their prifoner. At first thetidings feemed so incredible, that the formost messenger was held nor only for a vain liar, but also for one nor well in his wits : but after that there came one after another, and all with one voice verified and affirmed the same at length it was believed. And them, fee what they did! before they knew for certain that he approached neer unto the City; they all ran forth of the gates by heaps to fee the man : all (I fay) bond as well as free women and children one with another. In fo much, as the gates were choaked up with the thrust and throng of the prefs: for no man could believe affuredly it was true, the thing was to ftrange, unless he might fee him with his own eyes. They that had the charge of bringing him, found much ado to pur by the multirude whom they encounted, and to enter in at the gate : and so thickthey flood in the Fpress, that they took up all the wayes besides, so as he could not be brought forth to be seen Now because the most part of the people might not possibly have a fight of him, they gat up all at once into the Theatre, which Rood neer unto the way, and peltered it full; and with one voice they cried aloud; That he might be brought thither and presented unto the view of the whole people. The Magistrate and principal citizens, fearing lest the compassion that might arise in mens hearts upon the beholding of to worthy a personage, would raise some trouble and commotion; whiles some comparing the reverence of his former authority and Majeffy, with his present condition and calamity; and others calling to remembrance his manifold deferts and palling good turns, might haply be conched with pity i fet hims far off in the open fight of them all, and then at once cook him haftily out of their view; for their Pretor. Dinocrates gave out openly and faid, That the @ Magistrate were to enquire and demand certain points of him as touching the main sum of the totall war. Then he was brought into their Councel-Chamber, where their Senate affembled and began to confilt about him. It was now well coward evening; and to far off they were from sefolvingin other matters, that they could not bethink themselves and agree, in what place they snight keep him shar one night in taleguard. Aftonied they were and amaled; to confider and his keeping. At length some there were, that put them in minimus belongs while a recently with the his seeping. An eagus some stone very and salied all short with frong financiane. City, vanited under the ground like a dungeom, and salied all short with frong financiane. Listo it was he let down bound as he was and a sing by lines fibring their over of sharmle) was by an engin laid oversto enclose him lure. Thus reposing more trust for his safe custody makes place than in any person, they waited and ascended shource morning. When morrow day was come, the whole entire multitude in general, recommending the benefits and good turns done of old by him to their City, were of mind to pardom and pare him and by his means and mediation, to feek for remedies and redrefs of their prefere difficiles and ralameters. But these priors by whose motive and inducement the Mellemannhad sevoleed (and such were they as injedal) the common-weal), confulted apart in feerer, and concluded with one confert to pur him to death: only the doubt and question was, whether they hould do the thing with speed, or by I delay. But those prevailed in the end, who were more greedy of present revenge, and so they sent one unto him with a draught of poilion. When he had taken the cup in his hand (by repent) he gave not a word but only asked, whether Lycorea (the other General of the Acharans) were elicaped alive, and the forefaid horimen fafe? When answer was made, that they were in safety. That is happy, (quoth he) and therewith drunk off every drop in the cup right heartily, and a while after yeelded up his vital breath. But long joyed they not of his death' who were the bloody authors of this cruelty: for the City of Meffene being conquered by force of arms, among other capitulations, delivered these malesactors into the hands of the Achaans, who demanded presently to have them. The bones and resiques of Philopamen were likewile rendred unto them, and interred he was by the general Councel of all Achea, in such solemn wife, that in heaping upon him all ho- K nours that could be devised for an earthly man, they forbare not alloto adore him as a God immortal, The Historiographers; as well Greek as Latine, attribute so much unto this man, that some of them have recommended to posterity (as a memorable thing of all others that hapned this year:) to wit, that in this one year there died three renowned Captains, Philopamen, Annibal, Generals of the two most puissant nations in the whole world! Then came T. Quint ins Flamininus in embassage to King Prussa, whom the Romans had in suspition and jealousy, both sorthat he had received Annibal after the flight of Antiochus, and also because he made war upon Eumenes. Now, were it that among other matters Flaminius charged Prassas, that he entertained in his count the most spightfull enemy of all men living, unto the L people of Rome; who first follicited his own native countrey to take arms against the Romans, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeated, perswaded King Antiethia to do the like: or rather that Prufice of his own accord to gratify Flaminius there prefent and to do the Romans a pleasure, had a meaning and intent either to kill Annibal, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it came about, but upon the first communication and conference between them, there were fouldiers sent incontinently to beset and gnard his house. Annibatevermore forcast in mind some such issue and end of his lite, seeing the deadly and inexpiable hatred that the Romans bare unto him; repoing befides no confidence at all in the fidelity of these Kings, and having withal some experience already of the inconstancy and levity of King Prehas, Moreover, he had in horrour this coming of Flaminius, as fatal unto him, and a mean to M work his final destruction. To the end therefore he might be ever provided aforehand against those inconveniences and dangers, wherewith on all sides he was encumbred, and have a ready

way of evafion to fave himfelf, he had devised and canfed to be made seven dores for egress one of his house, whereof some were very privy and secret vanits; because they should not be envifoned with guards. But Kings commandments are of that force, than what foever they would have to be fearched out and discovered, cannot lie long hidden; For the guards for compassed and enclosed the wholecircuit of the house, that it was unpossible for any to get forth and make an efcape. Annibal being advertised that the Kings souldiers were as the gate, affaied to fleal away are postern, which stood furthest out of the way, and wherof the conveignce was most secres; but perceiving that the fouldiers had befor it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way, N and that every place was invested with a fer guard, he called for the poil on which he had of long time before ready prepared for all such occurrent occasions, and uttered these words withal, "Let " as rid these Romans of this their roscinual sear and pain wherein they have been all this while, "fince that they think it is long to flay for the death of one old man, Riaminima shall obtain no egeat nor memorable victory of me, difarmed thus as I am, and betraied into his hands Birthis "very day shall prove and testify, how far the people of Rome are degenerate and changed from "their ancient manners. Their forefathers (qd, he) advertifed King Pyrrhus their enemy atmed "in field, and lying with an host of men against them in Italy, they gave him warning I say totalle heed of posion: beet these living at this day, have sene their Embassador, even one that harby "Born the dignity of a Confulsto advise and counsel Prafix wickedly to take the life away of his Q own gueft. Then after he had carried the perform of Profites and his whole realm and called upon "the Gods, protectors of the law of hospitality, to bear witness how he had violated his faith "and broken premise with him, he service up of soliente his mouth, and drank it of. This was the end of Antibal, Polybins and Rutilius write that Scipio also died this year, But I saccord neither with them nor with Valerius, From them I fquare, because I find that when M. Portilis and L. Faler rius were Genfors, the same Li Palerius being Centor, was elected President of the Senies, where-

A as Africanus had been President for ten years space together, during the time of two reviews hy Cenfors next before, And fo long as the faid Africans, lived, there would have been no on ther chosen Presidencin his room, unless himself were to have been cassed and deprived of the Senators dignity, of which difgrace and note of infamy; there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for Valerius Amias, he is sufficiently refuted by M. Naviss a Tribun of the Commons, against whom there is an Oration extent, and the same penned by P. Africanus, and bearing his name. This Navius is recorded in the rols and registers of Magistrats, by the title of Tribun of the Commons, in that year when P. Clodin and L. Porcins were Confuls, but he entred into his office during the Confulthip of App, Claudin and M. Sempronius, the centh o: December. From which time tothe fifteenth of March are three months, upon which day Pub, Clodius and L. Porcius be-B gan their Confulfhip, Sout feemeth that he was living during the Tribmoship of Navins, and that he might well commense an action against him, and call him to his answer, but he departed this life before that L. Cato and M. Porcius were Cenfors. But in my conceit the death of thefe three (the most renowned perionages each one of their own nation) are not to be compared one with the other in this regard, that they hapned all just at one time, more than for this, that none of them all had an end correspondent and answerable to the portly state and glorious lustre of his life. For first and formost in this they all jumped together, that they neither died nor were enterred in their native countrey. Again, Annibal and Philopamen were both poisoned. Annibal was banished and betraied by his own friend and host, Philopamen was taken priloner, and left his life in prilon and irons. As for Scipio, although he was neither exiled nor condemned, yet making default of appa-C rance at the day affigned unto him, and being cited to his answer in his absence, willingly banished not himself only for his life time, but his corps and junerals also after his death. Whiles those affairs passed in Peloponnejus (from whence our pen hath a little diverted and di-greffed) the return of Demetrius and the Embafladors into Macedons, diverfly wrought in mens minds, and amused them some in one thing, and some in another. The common people of Macedomy, who were mightily afraid that the Romans would make war upon them, highly affected Demetrius, and cast a favourable aspect upon him as the author of peace, and withal they destined him without all doubt to the Kingdom after the decease of his father. For albeit he were younger than his brother Perfeus, yet menthought and spake, that he was begotten in matrimony by Philip of his lawful wife, whereas he had Perfeus by a concubin, who carried no token and mark of Da certain father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her body and common. Whereas Demetrius resembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be. Moreover, men faid, That the Romans would place and establish Demetrins in the Royal throne of his father, but

of age only would little boot and advantage him, confidering in all respects else he was inferiour to his brother, but Philip also himself, supposing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crown to whom he pleased, thought that his yonger son was amote in his eye, and troubled him more than was for his ease. Offended other whiles he was, that the Macedonians reforred unto him so much as they did, and highly displeased that there should be E any more royal courts than one in his realm, during his life. And to speak a truth, the young Prince himself returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt, with pride, than was befeeming; as who prefumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senat had of him, perceiving that they had granted those things to him which had been denied unto his father before: but look how much favor and honor (in respect of the Romans) he won among the rest of the Macedonia ans, so much envy and ill will he procured himself thereby not only with his brother, but with his father also: and especially after that other Roman Embaffadors were arrived, and that Philip was forced to part with Thracia and withdraw his garrifons, and to do other things either by vertue of the old award of the first commissioners, or by a new ordinance of the Senat. Welliteperformed all but with an heavy heart and many a deep figh and grone, and fo much the rather, be-Fraule he observed and saw how his som Demitrius converted more with the Embassadors, and frequented their company oftner than his! Howbeit he obcied, and did whatfoever was enjoined him by the Romans, because he would minister unto them no occasion of tevying war against him our of hand. And supposing it was good policy to a veretheir minds from all sulpition that he minded any such designs conding that ways he led his army into the mids of Thracia against the Odrysians, Danstielets, and Bessians, He wom the City Philopopolis, abandoned by the inhabitants who were fled, and had retired themselves with their whole samilies to the high mountains next adjoining and after he had wasted the Lands and territories of the Barbarians that inhabited the champain countrey, hereceived them mader his subjection by composition. Afterwards, having left a garrion at Philippopolis) which igoriofice was chaledland expelled by the Odryfians, he de-

approach of the Conful the Frenchmen yeelded the place. Twelve thousand they were that bare H arms, and most of them had by force gotten their armour out of their country villages, which was raken from them mandre their hearts, with all things elfe, that either they had gotten out of the country by pilling and robbing, or brought with them of their own. Whereupon they addressed their Embastadors to Rome, for to make complaint of these abuses and wrongs: who having andience given in the Senat by C. Valerius the Pretor, declared, how by occasion that Gaul was incharged with a multitude of people, they were conftrained as well for want of ground and poficisions, as also for need and poverty, to pais over the Alps and seek themselves some place of habitation. And where they faw any quarters forler, defart, and unpeopled, there they had planted themselves, without offering injury to any person: where also they had begun to build a Town. which might be a good proof and argument, that they came not to do violence upon any City or I country Village, And now of late M. Clandius had lent unto them a message, that unless they jubmitted and yeelded, he would war upon them: whereupon they preferring certain peace (although it were less honorable) before the doubful hazard & adventures of war, surrendered rather to be in the protection and safeguard than under the subjection of the people of Rome, But a few daies aftter, they were commanded to quit both City and Country. And thereupon refolved in their mind to depart in filence and faying never a word, into what place foever they could, there to feek their fortune : but then they were difarmed, yea, and spoiled and stript of all that ever they had, and nothing left, that either they drave before them, or carried about them, In regard whereof, they were humble suppliants to the Senat and people of Rome, that they would not proceed in more rigour and cruelty against them, harmless persons as they were, and submitting themselves K unto them, than against professed enemies. To this Oration of complaint the Senat caused this aniwer to be returned: That neither they had done well in coming into Italy, and presuming to build them a City upon other mens territories, without permission of the loveraign Roman Magiftrat, who had the government of those parts: nor yet the Senat was well pleased, that they should be thus despoiled, considering they had yeelded. And therefore minded they were to lend with them their Embassadors to the Consuls to command them in their name, to see that all their own goods should be restored again unto them, so that they made return thither from whence they came: who also should go forward insmediatly over the Alps, to give the States of France warning to keep in their people with them, and hold them in their native country : for almuch as the Also were the frontier limits standing in the mids to confine between them, and therefore L tholemountains neither ought nor might be passed of one side or the other: and to make account of this, that they should speed no better now in transgressing their bounds, than at what time as they first made a way and passinge over them into leasy. The Embassadors emploied about this bulands, were L. Furius Purpurio, Q. Minutius, and L. Mantius Acidims. Thus the Frenchaster reflictuage made unto them of all that was their own by good right, and without wrong of others, departed out of Italy. Now when these Roman Legats were come they had good words and courteous answer from the Transalpine nations. And those amongst them that were more ancient than the reft, blamed the people of Rome for their overmuch lenity, in that they let those persons go, who without warrant from the whole State, durft be to bold as to take a voyage to fettle apon any lands belonging to the Signory of Rome, and were so hardy as thereon to build a Town, For M furely they deserved not less than to abide grievous smart for their rash demeanor. Moreover and bendes, whereas the Romans have given them their own goods again, they feared much that fo great indulgency of theirs, would induce and encourage others to enterprife the like. So they friendly entertained and as kindly accompanied the Embaffadors yea; and liberally presented them with rewards.

M. Claudius the Conful having thus expelled the Gauls out of his Province, began to lay the ground of the litrick war, and for this purpose wrote his letters unto the Senat, for a warrant and commillion to país with his legions into Ifria. The Senat was therewish contented. But whereas they were in question and confultation about conducting a Colony to inhabite Aguileia, they could not agree whomto fend, whether Latins or Roman citizens. But in conclusion the Li. N. thought it better to plant there a Colony of Latins. The Primavirs for to effect this, were created. P. Segnic Nafica, C. Flominium, and L. Manlius Latins.

The fame year were two Colonies of Roman citizensere field at Magine and Parmin: and two thousand persons were to either place translated out of the territory which lately was obsupted by the Bohans and before time had been in the senare of the Tulesus. They of Parsia were endued with eight acres of land, and those of Masini with five a peece. The Triumvir-Commissioness who had the disposing and managing of the business, were Mackinghus Lepidus, T. Ebusius Carus, and L. Quintius Criffinus. Like wife the colony Susumia consisting of Roman citizens, was brought into the tetritedity of Caltra, by the condox of Q. Fubine Lubes, C. Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the Livy of Rome.

VV Hen Philip had given commandment to make streight search for the children of those whom he kept in prison (and personages they were of most noble birth) for to put them to death: Theoxena fearing the King his malicious intent and wicked lust in the behalf as well of her own children as of her Ofters little ones (God wor) and very yong infants, brought forth and offered unto the faid children naked keen foords and a cup of deadly posson, persuading with them to wood the imminish shame and dissonour, by prosent death; which after she had obtained and seen effected, she tikewise placed her own part and stem ber own felf. Moreover in this book are related the debate and variance between Perleus and Demettius the two ons of Phillip King of Macedony: and how Demetrius came to his death by poison, through the mischievous practise of his brother Perseus who devised full ecrimes and raised flanders against him: and principally among the rest, charged him that he intended to kill his own father, and meant to usurpe D the Kingdom, & 1 It of all, because be was a friend to the people of Rome: by which means after the death of Philip Perious obtained the crown. Alfo it containeth the happy exploits at chieved by many and divers commanders in Liguria, and in Spain against the Celtiberians. The books of Numa Pompilius were by certain husbandmen as they laboured in the ground of L. Petilius a Notary, under the Jamicu um; found enclosed within a coffer of Rone, and written both in Latine and Greek, And when thet Pretor of the Citysto whom the books were brought, had perufed them, and found therein many pothes tending to overthrow religion and the divine lervice of the Gods, he [wore bifore the Senat, that it was dangerous for the State and Common-wealth, that they should be read and preserved : in such fort that by an Att of the State, they were burned within the Comitium or Hall of publick affemblies. The Colony Aquileis was now erected. Philip exceedingly diffleafed with himfelf and pricked with remorfe of conscience for that E he had can d his fon Demetrius to be poisoned, upon the fulle suggestions and necusations of his other Sonf a med ag ainst him, devised to punish Perseus, and rather to confer the Kingdom upon An igonus his friend than that his sonshould succeed him't but in this destinance and purpose of his he sadding died; and so Peticus took the crown and Kingdom upon him.

"N the beginning of the year next enliting; the Confole and Pretors cast lots for their several governments. As for the Confuls there was no other Province to employ them in but Lieuria. The civil jurisdiction among citizens left to M. Ogulhim Gallus; and the forrein over firangers to M. Valerius, High Spain was affigued white Q, Fullias Placeus; and the Nether-land thereof to P. Mainthus L. Cecilius Deiter had the governance of Sicily, and C. Terentias for a of Sa dinia. The Confils were enjoyhed to take muffets for Q. Pabiar had written our of Ligaria; that the Appnairs inclined to rebeliton; and greatly to be feared it was, that they would break out and make rodes into the territory of Pifa And well they knew already, that of the two Provinces of Spains the higher parts were in arms and the war with the Celembertans was this in reain: and actor the lower the military discipline there was the incorrupt and gone, by featon of riotous pleatures and id enes where noto the fouldiers were wholly given, by occasion that the Prevor lay to long fick ... For thefetenile, thought good it was that new armies froud be levied and en olled to wir four legions for Ligaria, and every one of them to contain $200 foot and 300 horie: unto which & there will an addition of rioco footmen, and goo men of arm from our of the Latine allies. And the ferwo termies were to ferve the Confuls. But over and befides they were committed to enrol Theo foot, and odo horfemen of Dane allies, and them to fend inco France to M. Marters In, who was to continue fill in place of command, after the term of his Confesthip expired Likewife they had in charge to levy of Roman Citizens 400m footmen and 200 horle, and of allies 7000 of the one and 300 of the other to beconducted thro both Provinces of Spain. And Q.Fabine Liber had his commission of government renowed for one year longor, with the charge of that afmy which he had in Ligaria,

* 19 of April ; unto the god-I .calend Mai. which was Nas talu dies urbu Rome ; the birth day (as it were) of Rome.

The spring scalon that year was very floring and tempestuous. On the even of the seas, Palitia about nooff-ride, indestey there arole a mighty hufting wind, which overthrew many edifices as we have day professe. It can down the braten flating and images in the Capitol: it caught up onto the god at Wassacrees processes Annu August and the Tampic of the Asses, (which is in the Avening) caried is away, and let it fast to the back wall of the Temple of Ceres. It overturned and laid along other fixings in the great cinque or them-placed called Coren Maximus, together with the pillars upon which they flood. The lanterns and pinnacles it rent and tare after a ftrange fort from the roof and top of certain Churches, and carried them clean away. And therefore this tempell was held for a prodigious token, and the Armpices gave order for the expiation and latisfaction thereof, Likewije the same provision was made in regard of a report from Regre, that a mule was foled with three feet : and from Formie, that the Chappel of Apallo (and namely at C. jeta) was firlken j with lightning. For their prodigies, there were twenty greater beatts killed for tacrifice; and a supplication holden one whole day. And about the same time, intelligence was given by letters from A. Terentius the Pretor, that P. Sempron us having continued above a year fick, was departed this life, in the farther Province of Spain; which was the cause that the Pretors were willed to make more haft, and so much the sooner to pass into Spain.

After this, the embaffiges from beyond the Sea had and ence given them in the Senat. The first was that of the two KK, Eumenes and Pharnaces, and also of the Rhodians, who complained for the great lofs and overthrow by the Sinopians received. And about the fame inflant arrived also Embassadors from Philip, from the Achaans and Lacedamonians, who had their answer and disparch, after a speech made by Martins, who had been sent to visit the estate and affairs of Greece & and Macedony, But as touching the foresaid Kings of Assa, and the Rhodians, this stood for their answer; namely, That the Senat would fend their Embassaddors and Commissioners to take knowledge and see to all things there in place. But as concerning Philip, Martins had so told his tale, that he put the LL, of the Senat in more fear and perplexity: for in his declaration he confessed, that Philip indeed had accomplished the will and pleasure of the Senat, but in such fort, as it was evidencto be feen, that he would do fo no longer than he were held thereto and compelled of neceffity; for apparantit was, that he minded to make war again, confidering that whatioever he either did or faid tended to no other and, For first and formost he caused all the multipude to be removed and translated (with their whole families) out of the cities by the Sea-coast, into shar quarter which now is called ' Emabigand in times past was named Paonia; and gave shole 1. Cities aforesaid to the Thracians and other barbarous narrans to inhabit : supposing that this kind of people would be more fast and raithful more him in his wars against the Romans. And resily this deed of his bred a great discontenement and mumming throughout all Macedonia: infomuch, as few there were of shim, who thus left their native habitations together with their wives and child en, sharcould bire in and contain their fecret grief and heart-burning, and fay nothing : but being pricked and neiled more to anger than curbed and bridled with fear, they brake out and were heard to enrie and cay out upon the King as they went along the way in troops and companies. Hereupon his fell stomack by nature was logalled that he had all men in jealouly, and notime norplace there was, but he inspected. In the end, he beganto give it out openly, that he could not make account to be in lafety and security unless he apprehended and kept in prison the M children of those persons whom he had before-time killed, for so dispatch and make away them allo (in time) one after another. This crue ty in it felf bainous enough and enormous, the estamity and wofuil milery of one house made more odious and detettable. Murdered he had many years before Herodicus, a noble man and a Prin eof the Theffalians: and fometimeafter, he flew also his sons in law, who had married his daughters. These Gentlewomen being lest Widows, had each of them by their Husbands a little Son: and the names of these women were Theoxena and draho. As for Theaxens the would in no wife marry again, albeit the had many fairers there wood her: but Archowas wedded to one Poris, the very principal and noblest personage of the Accessivation: and when the had born him many children, the died, and left them all very yong. Themafterwards Theorems likewife, was married to the forefaid Prin, to the end, that the might si have the bringing up of those her fifters thildren with her own hands a and in truth she was not more kind to her ownpretty fon than to those her fifters children; but fo tenderly regarded them all slike, as if the bad born them of her own body. Now when the heard once of the Kings ed & and proclamation which was gone forth, for the apprehention of all those intapts whole fashers before had been put to death; supposing that their children should be exposed not only to the abuse and scornful mockery of the King, but also so the lust and villary of his grand, the concrived in her minden horrible designment: yes, and the fluck nosto, fay, That with her own hand the would rid them of their lives , sather than they thould come within the clutches of Rhihip. But Finis her husband (who abborred the very morning of to abominable a fact) faid that be would conveigh them out of the wayastar as Athens, to certain truffy steeds of his there, and o would himself improper person accompany them all the way thicher, and take part with them of that exile and bandlament. So they put themselves make it journey, all sognifier the and his wife and children from The fillowies to ward & Eres, wato a folemn lagificand feat which yearly which ale to celebrate with much come monions pomp. in the honor of Enew their first founder. -Now when they had spent what day an feathing full folentaly, about the shird watch of the night When all others were dounded less) they were tubasked in a thip prepared atortheed by Powe;

A making lemblance, as if they would return to The flatonich's but indeed purfishing to dut over to Eaches. But when they had laboured and wronght vo an object their the wind, which was full against them, they were overtaken and prevented by the thy light before they were tan Holl the Land, and past fight. And being discovered by the Kings fifthers, who had the charge and keeping of the haven, there was a plunate of fold (well appointed with armed men) let out to jetch in that veilel, with express commandment (as they would answer to the contrary at their utter peril) not to come again without it. Now as they approached neer, Ports verily for his part was very earnest with the rowers, mariners, and fallers, to pite their business and make way from them : otherwhiles firetching out his hands up to heaven, calling and praying unto the Gods to helo them in this their hard diffress. But the couragious lady his wife, all the while (turning again B to execute that defigminent of hers long before purposed) tempered and mixed a potion of poilon, and brought forth certain (words withal). Now when she had set the poiloned cup before the children in their very eye, and drawn the swords naked : Death (quoth she) is the only means we have to fave our liberty; to here the wayes that lead to death: now as every ones heart flandeth to this or that take thereto, and avoid the cruelty and pride of the King. Come on lads and jolly firiplings, lead you the way first that are the bigger and elder : take sword in hand, fall thereupon and work the feat at once: or if ye lift rather to be long a dying, drink here of this cup, What should they do? the enemies were fast upon them ready to boord their vessel, their mother on the other fide, encouraging them inflantly to take their death. In fuch wife, that to conclude, fome dying the one way and some the other, were all cast headlong over shipboord, when they C were but half dead. Then the for her part embracing her husband about the middle (because the would dye with him for company) threw her felf and him both together into the Sea. Thus the Kings men feized upon the ship, when the masters thereof were gone. The horrible example of this fact kindled more coals, and set the malice and hatred kindled against the King as it were on a light and flaming fire anew, infomuch as now commonly in all places they fell to open cursing of him and his children. Which maledictions and executions at

was not long but all the Godsliffned and gave ear unto, and caused that he likewise exercised cruelty even upon his own flesh and blood." For Perseus leeing his brother Demetrius to arise every day more than other in favour, greatness, and reputation with the whole Macedonian pep-

ple, and to grow also in credit and grace among the Romans, supposing with himself how he had all his thoughts and studies that way, and aimed only at that mark. But believing verily that he wasnot frong enough and inflicient alone, to execute and bring forth io much only, as within in no other hope left him of attaining to the crown, but by the means of some wicked practile bent

that unmarily and womanish mind of his hehad deviled and conceived, he practifed with his fathers friends, and efricons founded their hearts one by one apart, catting out ambiguous and doubtful speeches. And at the first verily some of them shewed countenance, as if they could not abide to hear of any such thing became they reposed more hope in Demetrius. But afterwards, as the hatred of Philip grew daily greater against the Romans, which Perfeus fill fostered and maintained, whereas Demerrius with all his might laboured against it; they fore-leeing in their mind the unflariby end of Deminities, who lay too open and was not needful enough to guard limited. E against the translatent and mitchievous plots of his brother, fided with Perfent; making this account in pulicy, to fet that agoing and leftly forward, which in the end would take effect, and namely to entertain and advance the hope of the mightier. For the execution of the reft they re-ferved every thing to a meet and convenient this therefore. As for the prefert, the best course they thought upon was this, to incente the King all that ever possibly they could against the Romans, to induce and put him forward fail to think of nothing but war, whereto of his own acmans, to induce and put him notward that to think of nothing out war, whereto of his gwin according mid flood well enough and was enclined. And withal (to the end that Demetrias ingle) be from day to day notice and mide thing extend to they chired of purpole as before they were agreed into freech; as touching the trace and great port of the Romans: whereas when some of them would feeld again in touching were adjusted to the Romans: whereas when some of them would feeld again in touching were to detail their manners and fathions, others to de-F prave their deeds and acts, fome Rolling in general at the very form and making of their City, how it was not yet embeddied a beautiful either with flarely edifices in publick places, or with how it was not yet entirelished & beats and the entire with stately editices in publick places, or with fair hould of private mayif, other mothing and having in dession the principal and chief personages of the City in particular, the included that was in dession the principal and chief personages of the City in particular, as with a defice to got in his bracket, would as liver to all hole points in the desence and mainfeathness of the Robinss. Now is hortuned that the time was come of the ordinary review of his army, the folemnity wherof was usually performed in this manner. They cut a dog overthwart the midft in two halfs, the head and foregarts together with the entrals were set on the right hand of the high way; the hind parts on the left Between this facrifice thus divided, the companies in their armour passed in a shew. Before the front of the vanguard were carried the coats of arms and royal enigns of all the Macedonian Kings I that ever had been from the beginning. Then followed the King himfelf in person with his children. Next marched the Kings guard and cohort, with the fquires of his body. And last of all in the reregard behind came the reft of the multitude and commons of the Macedonians. Of either fide of the King went his fons, two lufty Gentlemen. Perfess was about 30 years old, and Demetrists five years yonger; the one in the mids and best of his age and strength, and the other in the yery prime and flour thereof. An happy father had he been for fo fair iffue, feeing this proof, this maturity and perfection of theirs, if the grace of God had gone withal, and that they had been well difpoled and affected in mind. The manner and cultome of this review and folemn light was lafter the facrifice duly accomplished) for the whole army to joust and courney in this wife that being divided into two battailons, they should one charge the other, and represent the shew of a very w conflict and let field. And who should be the chief leaders and captains in this brave passime, but the Kings two fons? But believe me they jefted never a whit, nor made a vain thew for disport, but went to it roundly in good earnest, as if they would determine now who should be King another day? Foul work they made with their woodden wasters and headless pikes; many were wounded, and nothing wanted there but sharp iron, of a very bloody battel indeed. That regiment which Demetrius commanded, had the upper hand by ods, Perfous thewed himself highly dipleafed and angry thereat; but contrary-wife his friends and favourits of the wifer fort, rejoyced at it, and made remonstrance, That this was the only thing to minister just occasion unto him for to challenge and accuse his yonger brother. Now the same day, the one as well as the other leasted their companions, who had thus performed the joults and tournaments of either fide with them. Perfens was invited by his brother to supper, but he resuled and denied to come. Howbert such was the good fellowship amongst them, and so merry were the yong gallants and lusty Cavaliers, that they paffed the feastival day in all joy and mirth, either part with their Captain, and plied the winefull liberally. Then in their cups they fell to discouring freely of their running and passime, and began to cast out merry conceits and broad jests at their adversaries of the contraty side, informech as they forbare not to glance at the very Captains themselves. Now had Reference a privy fpie, one of his guests, to liften what good talk there was at his brothers boord, but he demeaning himself & walking not so circumspectly as he should, was encountred by certain youths, that chanced to come forth of the hall or parlor where they fate at supper, and was evil entreated and well beaten for his labour. Demetria nothing awate thereof, among other table talk, Why M go we not (qd,he) and banket with my brother and if there remain any anger and displeasing behind after our joufting in jeft, appeale and mitigate the fame in implicity of heart and mutil-making? Mary, no better, tried they all again with one voyce, fave only those that seared to be mer withal preferrly and lerved alike for militing & knocking the lottaid frie. But what can be carried so secret, but out it will, where there is inselfine discord in one family. All was full of these and falle knaves, as well in the one house as the other. For there can a pick-thankand tale carier before unso Perfess, and declated unto him that there were coming with Department of you men with privy skeins by their fides. And albeit he wift well enough what was the called hereof (for N he had heard that one of his guests was by them beaten) yet so aggravate the muter and make it more odious he commanded the dote to be fall locked and from the upper rooms and lofting of the house and out of the windows to the street side, he kept off and repelled those (this came to banhet and be merry with him) from approaching the dore, as it their coming were for no other purpose but to murder him. Despring after he had for a stime, cried one, in the first and rich on for this distract and indignity. Taying it was long of the ring and robing elle that he was thus excluded seturned again to his own house to make a nend of the banker there: and all this while excluded, returned again to his own house to make an end of the bankes there; and all this while knew nothing what the matter was. As for them, if they were to give their opinion, they shought it not good to accept of the Ligurians suprender: and being once received then to be dispated in but they were of this mind and advice, that it was requisit they should be sen and referred over to the Consuls.

The Pretors at the same time arrived in their Provinces, to wit P. Martius in bale Spain, where O he had been Governor before during his former Pretoxibipiand Q. Fulvius Placess in the highest where he receive the army of Terenius; for that other side of Spain beyond theres, had been left wathout a Lord Deputy, by occasion of the death of P. Semprasius the Pro-pretor. Whiles Fulvius Placess: assumed a Town in Spain named Unbicula, the Celtiberians made head and came upon hims where many and sinday hot skirmines paided, and wherein many Roman souldings were both hure and slain, blowbeis Eukains held still his resolution, and by no for-

A cible means what loever, could be brought to levy the fiege. The Celtiberians to lied out of frear with divers combats, actived and departed. The City then techne their fluctours diflodged and gone, which in the daies was forced and ranakeds and the Pretor gave the pillage thereof to his foundings. Thus Fulvius after he had gained this Town, and P. Markini, when he had retired and ralling his forces into one place, which, had been differed, without any other memor. He at the performed, brought their armies within the wintering harbours. And these were the exploite in Spain, during that lummer fealon. Terennia who was depicted out of that Province before, entred the City of Rome in a petry triumph, by way of ovation. He carried before him in thew, eight though there hundred and twenty pound weight of liver, and source of gold: besides two golden-coroners weighing 67 pound.

The same year the Romans were chosen Arbitrators between the people of Carthage, and King Malaniffa as touching their recritories : and came perfonally to fee the place in controverly. And thus flood the case; Gala the father of this M. fanisa, had won the ground in quellion from the Carthaginians. Suphar afterward differzed Gala thereof: and confequently to gratify Aldrebal, his wives father, freely gave the same to the Carthaginians, and set them in possession again, Now last ot all, even this very year, Masmiffa had dispossessed the Carthaginians of the same. This matter was debated by the parties of both fides in the prefence of the Romans, with no less conrage and fervency of spirit, than at other times when they tried the iffue by dipt of sword in open field. The Carthaginians laid claim and put in their plea. For that first it appertained to their anceftors in right of inheritance, and afterwards was conveighed to them by the free gift and doing-C tion of Syphax. Mafaniffa counterpleaded again and alledged, that he had both recovered the faid territory, as parcel of his fathers realm, and also held it by the law of nations: and that the cale was cleer on his fide, in regard as well of the just title as also of the present possession wherein he was; faying, that in his cause he doubted nothing else but that the modely of the Romans should prejudice him, for fear lest they might be thought to be partial in the cause and respective to him, a King their ally and good friend, and in favour of him to give up their award against the common enemies both to him and them. The Commissioners and arbitrators would not infringe and alienat the right of possession, but lest all as they found it, and referred the entire decifion of the matter to the Senat of Rome. Nothing was there done after this in Ligaria: for firly the enemies were retired for fafety into

m their wilds and forrests out of the way and afterwards they cassed their army, and slipt away every man to their own villages and callles. The Confuls likewife were willing to break up and diffiniss their forces, and thereupon fent to the LL, of the Senat to know their pleasure in that point; who advised the one of them to discharge his own regiments, and repair to Rome for the election of Magistrate the next year: and the other, with his legions, to winter at Pifa. A rumour there ran, that the Transalpine French put their youth and serviceable men in arms: but it was not known. what quarter of haly this multitude thus levied would invade. But the Confils thus agreed together, that Gn. Babius should be present at the general assembly at Rome, for the election aforelaid, be anse M. Babius his brother fired to be Conful. Then was the affembly holden for the creation of Con uls, and elected there were, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Babius Tamphilus. This done, E the Pretors also were chosen, namely, the two Quintis Fabri, the one Maximus, and the other Betea: T. Claudius Nero Q. Peteleus Spurinus, M. Pinarius Posca and L. Duroneus. When these were entred into their magistracy, the Provinces were by logafter this manner disposed. The Ligurans fell to the Confuls: as for the Pretors, Q. Petilius was Lord chief Justice for the citizens pleas, and Q. Fabius Maximus for the strangers: Q. Fabius But co had the government of Gaul, T. Claudius Nero of Secilia, M. Panarius of Surdinia, L. Duronius of Apulia together with the Infrans: for that the Tarentins, and Brundufins had given intelligence, that the fea-coafts were much troubled and annoied by the robberies of pirats and men of war from beyond Sea : and the like complaints were made by the Massilians, of the Ligarian navy. For these causes order was given, and warrants went out for to levy armies: that the Confols should have four legions between them, containping in every one 5200 Roman footmen and 300 horse: also to enrol 15000 footmen and 800 horsemen of Latine allies. In the Provinces of Spain (both the one and the other) the o'd Pretors continued fill in their government, with the charge of those armies which they had already; and for a supplement to reenforce and make up their broken companies, there were appointed 3000 loot and 200 horse of Roman citizens gogether with 6000 of the one and 300 of the other from out of the Latine nation, All this while they forgat not their navy at Sea. And the Confuls had in charge to chuse for that purpose, two wardens called Duumvirs, who after they had out of the Atlenal those into the Sea twenty thips, and fet them affore, thould furnish them with mariners, and those Roman citizens, such as had been flaves and were enfranchised; and that natural Romans, free, born should only be Captains and have the conduct of the said vessels. These two G Dunmvirs fo parted and ordered betwire them the defence of the maritime coalts, with ten ships apeece; that the Cape of Minerva should be as it were the middle point and mark between them: so as the one should guard that part on the right hand as far as to Massina; and the other the left fide even to Barium.

This year were feen at Rome and reported from forsain parts many uncouth and strange prodigies. In the Church-yards belonging to Vulcan and Concerdia, it rained sheer blood: and the Bishops made relation, that the Spears of Mark. shook and moved of their own according * Lex de am-

Allo at L'investmen the image of Juno Sofpie shed tears, Moreover, the plague reigned to hot in M the controy villages market Towns marts and places of frequent refort, yea, and within the Circ of Rom , that they were not able to formith the funerals accordingly and inter the dead, The 11 of the Sepat, being in great anguish and trouble, in regard of those tearful to keins and the loss of their people, ordained. That as well the Conful should kill greater beasts for incrise a mate what Gods they thought good as also the Decemvits should visit and peruse the prophetical books of Silylla, And by vertue of their de ree there was publick supplication proclaimed at Rome for one whole day, at all the alters and thrines of the gods and goddeffer. By their counsel also and die rection, both the Senate advited and the Cominis also published throughout all leals for these daies space, solemn litanies and devous holy-daies. The rage of this pestilence was so great, that whereas there paffed an act by the Senate to entol 8000 footmen and three hundred houe from 1 out of the Latins (in regard that the Handers of Corfica were revoked and the Iolians up in arms within Sardinia) with which power M. Pinarins the Pretor was total over into Sardinia; the Confuls made report again unto them, that fuch numbers of people were dead already, and fo many lay he k, that it was not possible to levy that proportion of fighting men. So the Pictor had commission to furnish our that desect of souldiers, with a supply which he was to receive of Cn. Babius the Pro-conful, who then wintered at Pife; and from them directly to take the feat and pals over into Sardinia.

L. Duronine the Pretor funto whom the Province of Applia was allorsed) had a commission befides to make inquifition for the Bacchanals for there remained yer fome feeds of the former enormities, which began already the former year to sprout and bnd totth. But L. Pappin the Pretor w latt before had entred into the enquiry and learth of the matter, rather than effected oughy and brought it to a final end : and therefore the LL, gave order to this new Pretor to cuttoff this mitchief in the ipring and breeding thereof, before it gat more head a second time, and upon growth fpred farther. Moreover the Confuls by the advice and authority of the Senat, preferred certain laws unto the peop e, as touching the * inordinat init and ambitions tecking after offices of government. After all this, they brought into the Senar the fortein embaffiges; and gave andience first to them that came from the KK, to wit, Eumenes, Ariar tes the Cappadocian, and Pharmaces of Pastus. But no other dispatch and answer they had than this. That they would fend certain Delegats and commissioners, to hear, decide, and determine their controverses. After them the Emb fladors of the Lacedzmonian exiles, and of the Acharns, were admitted into the Senst 2 house. The banished persons aforesaid were put in some good hope, that the Senat would write their letters to the Achaans for their reflauration, The Achaans declared as touching therecovery of Meffine and the pacification of all troubles there, with the great contemment of the LL. of the Senat. There arrived moreover two Embaffadots from Philip Ring of the Macedonians, Demely Philocles and Apelles, about no fuit that they had to the Senat, but fent rather as ipies to under-prie and to learn somwhat as touching those points that Perfore had charged Demetring with, and namely of certain speeches that he should have with the Romans, and especially with T. Qu're zi. 1, ag unit his brother bout increffion in the Kingdom. Thefe twain were chofen by the King as indifferent perions, and nothing affectionat either to the one brother or the other: howbeit they were the ministers, contous, and complices of Perfens, in his intended michievous plot a- M gainst his brother. Demetrins (as one ignorant of all designments against him. but only of the late wicked prank of Perfess which laft brake out) at the firtt, was neither in great hope, nor yet in niter despait, to be reconciled unto his father. But afterwards, he had less confidence every day than other in the good affection of his father toward him, feeing his brother continually to buz into his ears many matters, and possess his head with tales against him. And therefore he looked circum pectly about him that he trode not away, and namely, that he let no words fell or did any thing that might be offensive and breed more jealousy; and above all, he wholly forbare conference and commer e with the Romans ; in Inch fort, that he would not have them fo much as to write any letters unto him: knowing full well, that his fathers heart would be exasperated against

Philip because he would provide that his fouldiers and men of action front nor degenerate and wax worte through idlenes and difuse of sens and that under one he might evert from himself all suspicion that he intended any war against the Romans, appointed the City Stobi for the Rendez. wow of his army and marched into the quarters of Madicia great defire he had to mount up the * catera mundi, creft & rop of the hill * Emus becanfe these was anopinion commonly seceived & which he had given credit unto that from thence a man might discover within one profest, the " Portik and Adriatick leas, the river Ifter alfo and the Aprilog thus he thought, that the view of thele places would fland him in no fmall flead in projecting & plotting the war against the Romans. LA " befell to Antigones in the like cafe, who being upon a time much toffed at Sea in a boilferon rempets, and having with him in the fame flaig all those that we're of his blond, is reported to have given this good advertilement and lefton to his children, that they should alwayes re-"member, and allo give their posterity warning never to venture all their goods in one bottome. "nor to engage themselves together with their wholerace and off-foring in any peril and danger "Remembring therefore (qd,he) this good precept and counted of his, I will not hazard both my "fons at once in this prefent jeopardy which I fee before mine eyes: but for almuch as I propose to take mine elder fon with me, I will lead my yonger back into Macedony, for to uphold and Emaintain the hope of my posterity, and for the detence of my Kingdom in the mean while. Demetrius found bim ffreight, and wift well enough that he was fent away for no other intent bur R that he should not be present in counsel, when upon the view of those places abovelaid, he was to devile and confule in what coast lay the neerest and shortest way to the Adriatick Sea and to Italy, and what course they should plot for the management of the war. But there was no remedy he must not only then obey his father, but also sooth him up and seem to approve and like well of that which he faid, for fear left it might be thought, that it went against his stomack to yeeld obedience unto him, and so be held in more jelousy and suspicion than before. How beit, to the end that he might pals into Macedony with fafety, Didas one of the Kings Deputies and L. Governor under him of Panna, was commanded to accompany and conduct him with a mean guard and convoy. Now was this Didas one of those conspirators that had sworn the death of Demetrius, whom Perfeus had made fure to his partilike as he had many other of his fathers friends even fince C that men began to make no doubt, unto whom Philip in affection was enclined, and whom he meant to make the heir apparent of the crown, And at this very inflant Perfeus had charged him and given him instructions, by all obsequious services to insimpare and wind himself into most familiar talk, and to come so neer within him, that he might draw from him all his secrets, & discover the very inward and hidden thoughts of his heart. Thus departed Demetring attended with a trainabout him more dangerous to his person, than if he had travelled alone without any company. Philip first passed through Madica, and then forward over the desarts lying between Madica and Amus, and at the leventh daies march was come as far as to the foot of the mountain. Where after he had rested and stated one day to make choice of those whom he minded to take up with himsthemorrow after he fer forth & put himself in his way. At the first the labour was not great, n nor the pains much to overcome the nethermost hills ; but thefarther they went and the higher that they advanced the more wild and woody still they found every place; yes, and they met with many that had no passage at all. At length they were mounted to a pass or way so shadowed and dark, that for the trees standing so thick together, and their boughs plaited and interlaced one within another learcely or hardly could a man fee the skie through them. But when they approched once the pitch and creft of the mountain, behold (athing not lightly feen in other parts) they light upon to gross and thick a milt, which overspread and tovered all that they had as much ado to march forward, as if they had travelled in the dark semid-night, At last by the third daies end, they gained the very top of the mountain. Now when they were come down from thence again, they made no less report thereof than the common opinion was that went of it; which I believe E verily they did of purpole, because they would not be mocked and scorned for this their foolish. and vain voiage, rather than for that they could indeed within the fame prospect and from one place, view leas, mountains, and rivers, fituat and diffaur fofar alunder. Much moiled they were all. and fore toiled in this untoward way but the King above the rest, by reason that he was far stept in age, and unweldy of body. Well, after he had done facrifice there upon two akars conferrated to Junior and the Sun he descended in two daies, whereas he had made three of it in ascending : and that which he feared most, was the cold nights, which there in the beginning of the dog daies were like to those of midwinter in other places. Many difficulties he wrefiled and frove withal sturing those daics, and being resurned into his tamp, he found no better. Nothing was there but marketin want & pennty, as being pitched in a place compafied about on every fide with defarts and wilderness. And therefore when he had staied there but one only day to rest and repose his men, whom he had taken with him in that journey, he hatfired away, and in a running march, as if he had fied in rous, entred the country of the Deuthelets. These Deuthelets were his own consederar away near in consecured the country of the Deuthelets, thele Deuthelets were his own confederate addies, but the Macedonians (fuch was their need and sectingly) pilled and to poiled their confines, we less than it they lind been professed ententes. For first they wanted to destroy the destroy of the second for the secon to tech a compart and give the situate from the higher placespate commanded the Lown. The Lownburt that higher placespate commanded the Lown. The Lownburt think high placespate commanded the Lownburt that high state the same was recircle; they forecame shear pledges, abandoned the Lowbergham to the lower than the lower pition of his ion Demeria, by the level prictile and falle fuggestions of Didas (she Governor

862 of Panish) teturned into Macellany. This Didde (as first been faid before) tent to conduct Deme | H that home, abated the famplicity of the young Gentlehun, who was nothing circumine of and warp from home, some the manufactory or the year of the season was account to the season was to be kented diff. Or entirely and complained to him (as good cause he had) of those that were never the season was to be but seemen an concerned and companies to introducing by foothing him up, and seeming wishall in ability and broad arise him; he, Fay, by the terring, by foothing him up, and seeming wishall to be offended and grieved for his part at facts hard usage, laid finares and gries, and in traps for him; and in conclusions by his double difference, and offering his voluntary service to do him pleafure, protesting allo to be true and fast unto him, yea, and to keep his counsel, setthed out of him the very secrets of his heart. Now had Demotrins a purpose with himself to flie to Rome, and to effectuate this designment of his, he was perswaded, that of a special grace and favour the Gods had fent and offered unto him this Didas the Pretor of Pania to be his helper and affiliant; for through his Province he conceived some hope to pass and escape with security. This intent and I plot of his was both immediately disclosed to his brother Perseus, and also by him declared to his father. And first were letters hereof brought unto him, whiles he lay at the fiege of Petra. Afterwards Herodorns (the principal friend that Demetrins had) was committed to ward, and withal order was taken to watch and observe Demetrius that he started not aside; but all underhand and close, without semblance of any such matter. These occurrents above all others, caused the King to have a dolorous and heavy return into Macedony. These new acculations thus presented troubled him much: howbeit he thought good to expect the return of those whom he had sent to Rome as foies to hear all and find out the truth. In the anguish and agony of these cares and perplexities, when the King had continued certain months, in the end those Emballadors came home; who at first ere they set foot out of Macedom, had devised and framed before hand what reports they K would make from Rome. These messengers, to make up the full measure of all their wicked and divellish practises, delivered also into the Kings hand a falle and forged letter, sealed with a counterfeit figner of T. Quintius. The faid letter was indited to this tenor and effect, That Quintius fhould feem for his own excuse to say, that about youg Demerius, Carried away with an inordinate defire to be King, had flipped a little, and treated with him about fome fuch matter, yet would be do nothing to prejudice any one about K. Philip, berther would he be thought or found a man-to give any ungodly and ungracious counsel. These letters struck it dead fore, and made the King beheve that all the former imputations faftned upon Demerrius were true and past all peradventure. Whereupon Herodorus prefently was put to the tack and examined, but after he had endated inreferable pains a long time, and confessed nothing, he died in the end ander the tormentors hand, I Perfeut accused Demerrius again before his father, for that he intended and provided to takehia flight through Pagnia. And there came forth certain to tellify against him, saying, that he had Philip himlest taking his journy from The falmics to come to Demetrias, less Demetrias his fonto Estreum, a Uity in Paonia, and the same Didas still reaccompany him: but Persons head diessed to Amplipation for to receive the hostages of the Phracians. Now it is reported, that when Didse took his leave of him and departed; the Kinggove him in charge to kill his fon De-metrius. Didse then, either purposing indeed or making femblance to facilities, invited Demorita to the celebration and leaft thereof, wherespon he came from exfreem to Heracles. And is meniay) at this supper he met with a cup of posson. Fle had sto some drunk it, but immediatly he felt that he was feed; for within a while it began to work extreamly, and for very dolour and pain, he was forced corrie from the Table and retite into his bed-chamber: where he pition !! complained of the hard heart and crueky of his father, of the murderons mind of the particide his byother, and of the recherous williamy of Didnet: and all this while endured deadly wrings and toffments in his belly. But afterwards there were fent into the chumber, one Toffe, a Senbergan, a and Alexander of Beryhau, who en wropped his head and throat with the bed-clostis, carpets, and counterpoints of sapistry, and field them so hard, that they shreeted and smothered him and in the end fropped his breath that be died. Thus was this poor imporent your man piceously made away; whole enemies one single kind of death could not convenuent latesty, but needed her ditiff kill and murder them twice.

corrupted, invested, and induced them to accompany him in that journey. But that which made most of all against him, was that same devised keet of T. Quinting. Howbeit there was no grievous sentence pronounced openly against him, to the end, that rather by some covert and causelous practice, he might come to his death : and this, not for any fear that he had of him, but doubting left fome open punishinent executed upon him, might reveal and discover his secret design-ment, of making wat upon the Romans, durkill and murder them twice.

Whites chelethings hapned in Macedony, L. Bonflins Paulas, who continued fill in government after his Confulfhip expired, marched with his army against the Ligurians linguists in the beginning of the spring. So soon as he was entred into the confines of his enemies contrary, and there encamped, there came Embaffadors mito him under colour of feeking peace, ber indeed only to efcour and fpie. Pantarande them answer. That he could contract no accord with them. unless they yeelded first : which every feemed move o much to resuse, bur said. That they needed force time to perfessed their marken into it being a sade and uncivilating of people. And when they had ten dates trice allowed to effect this, they requested misreover that the R oman fouldiers might nor pass over the next hills adjoying, where for fewel or forage, for a funch as those lands were the only tilled and well mainuted grounds of their apparentaires and remitory, When they had obtained to much, they affentibled all their fores our has fide of the hills; from whence they

A had averted the enemies and fuddainly with a mighty multitude charged upon the Roman camp. and affaulted all the avenues and gates thereof at once. With all forcible means they continued the affinit in fach fort, as the Romans had not fo much as either time enough to fet forth and difolay their enfigusior room sufficient to put their army in order of battel: but were compelled to defend their camp more by flanding thick thronged together against the enemies in the very gates then otherwiseby hardy fighting. But about the going down of the fan, when the enemies were retired. Paules dispatched two light horsemen with letters to M. Babius the Conful, as far as Pila, that he should come away with all speed to succour him, being in time of trute besieged. But Babins had delivered up his army before to M. Pinarius, the Pretor, as he went into Sardinia. Howbeit he both certified the Senat by his letters, that L. Amplius was invefted by the B Ligurians, and he wrote also to M. Cl. Marcellus, whose province was next adjoining, to bring over his forces (if he thought so good)out of Gaul in to Ligaria, and deliver L. Amplius from fiege. But also, these succours should have come all too late; for the Ligurians the very next day returned and advanced against the camp. Langling, albeit he not only knew that they would come, but also might have brought his power forth into the field and ranged them in array, yet he kept himfelf to close within the strength of his rampiar, minding to hald off and not to fight, untill Bebies might with his army come from Pife. Now the letters of Behins caused great fear at Rome : and so muce the more, for that Marcellus being returned to the City, some few daies after he had made over his army unto Fabins, put them out of all hope, that the army which was in France could not possibly passe into Ligaria, by reason of the war with the litrians, who impeached the planting C of the colony at Aquileia; against whom Fabins was gone, and might not possibly retire from thence, now that the war was once begun. The only hope they had therefore of aiding Amylina was this, (and yet the same seemed to be with the latest, confidering the urgent necessity of the time) in cale the Confuls made halt to go into their privinces : which to do all the LL, of the Senat called aloud and earnestly unto them. But the Consuls denied flatly to stir one foot before the levy of fouldiers was fully finished; alledging that it was not their slackness, but the violence of the plague, which cauled it to be fo late ere it were performed. Yet for all this, fuch was the general accord and confent of the Senat, that they could neither will nor chuse but go forth of the City in their rich coats of arms, and by proclamation to assigne a certain day, upon which all the fouldiers whom they had enrolled should show at Pife; and commission they had to take up D subitary souldiers, all the country over as they went, to present them forth presently and have them away. Moreover, the Pretors, Q. Petilius and Q. Fabins were both of them commanded, the one. namely, Petiliar, to enrol in halt two tumnituary legions of Roman citizens, and tender the military oath to all that were not above fiftie yeers old : and Fabius, to levy of the Latine allies fifteen thousand foot, and eight hundred horsemen. The two Dumwirs or Wardens for the navy and the ports were created, namely, C. Mattenus and C. Lucretius, who were foon provided of thips ready rigged, trimmed and jurnished to their hands. And Matienes, who had the charge of the coasts upon the gulf of Gaul, was commanded to bring his fleet with all speed possible along, to to the tract of the Ligurians, if hapily he might any way ited L. Emplim and his army. Emplisu after he perceived that no aid appeared from any place, supposing verily that the two horse men above-taid, were intercepted and staied by the way, shought good to put off no longer, but alone with his own forces to trie the fortune of a fight. And thereupon before the enemies came (who now already began more coldly and heavily to affail them then before) he put his men in battell array at the four gates of the camp, to the end that upon the figual given, they fhould at once from all parts fally forth. To the four extraordinary cohorts, he adjoined two other, under the conduct of M. Valerius a Lieutenant, and commanded them to break forthat the falle postern gate called Extraordinaria : within the gate Principalis on the tight hand, he embattelled the Hafratior Inveliners of the first legion, and the principes of the same legion in the rearguard to fecond them, commanded both by M. Serviliu and L. Salpinas, Komarihals, or Tribunes military. The third legion he marshalled full against the other gate Principalis on the left hand. This change p only was here, for that the Principes were let fir the from, anothe Haltati behind in the tail of them. Sex. Inline Cafar and L. Aureline Cosin, two military Tribunes had the leading of this fegion. Q. Fulvius Flacenca Lieutenant, having the conduct of the right wing, was placed at the gate Quistoria. Two collors and the Tristii of two legions and commandment to flay behind for the defence of the camp. The Generall himself in perfor rode all about from gate to gate, and not the descent of the country in a country with the forcible another possibly could device, to provoke and when the fromacks of his foldiers, and to give a polnant edge to their courage and choler : one Willekeptoaching his enemies for their fallhood and dreathery; who having craved piece and obtained trace; during the time obtain faid trace; against all less of mations were s come to affeil the camp: another while strewing and declaring into them what shame and " indignity it was for the Roman army to be belieged by the Rigarians, who more truly may "be accounted theeves and tobbers, then go for warlike enemies. At these werds the fouldiers fet up a confonant crie in token of applaufe, and answered him with a general floore. faying, there was no fault on their part, feeing that no man had given them the fignal to iffue forth and make a fally. For let him but once fay the word to found the trumpet, he should fee and find, that both Romans and Ligurians were the fame fill as before-time. Now the Ligurians kept two camps on the neer fide of the mountains aff ront the Roman leaguer 4 from whence (for the first daies to foon as the sun was up) they used to advance their ensigns, and march forward I well armed and ranked in battell array ; but then they put no armor upon their backs, nor took weapon in hand, before they had filled their bellies well with meat and their heads with wine : they came forth (I (av) dispersed and out of order; as who hoped and trusted assuredly, that the enemies would not march under their enfigns without their rampier. Against them (coming thus in diferray) the Romans issued forth at once, out of all the gates in one instant with a mighty shout, which not only they who were within the camp fet up, but also the lackies, scullions, landers, and other drudges that follow the camp redoubled. This was such an unlooked for occurrent to the Ligurians, that they were let in as great an affright therewith, as if they had been furprited & befet all about with juddain ambushments. For a smal whilethere was some shew of a conside. fuch as it was ; but anon they took their beels and fled for life; but as they fled, they left their lives K behind them in every place. Then the men of arms had the figual given to mount on horseback, to purine them & not luffer one to elcape alive : & lo in this fearful rout they were driven to take their camp for fafety : but in the end were differzed and turned out of it alfo. That day were flain of the Ligurians not to few as hitten thouland, and 2500 taken priloners. Within three daies after the whole nation of the Ligurian Ingaunes, yeelded absolutely, and put in their hosts. ges. A learch was made for all the pilots and mariners, who had exercised piracy on the sea, and they were all laid up fast in prison. Sembably C. Matterns one of the Dummyirs or wardens of the navy met with two and thirty thips of that fort, belonging to men of war upon the coalt of Ligaria, and boorded them. To carry thele news to Rome, and letters to the Senat, L. Aurelius Catta, and C. Sulpitim Cotta were fent to Reme: who also were to require that L. Amplim (when L his time was expired) might depart out of his province, and bring his fouldiers from thence with him, and to discharge them of fervice. Both thele demands were granted by the Senat, and a folemn procession belides was orderned in all churches and chappels, and at every shrine and alar for three daies inace. The Pretors also were commanded, Petileus, to casse and dimisse the legions of the City 2 and Fabius, to remit the Latine allies the levying and mustering of their souldiers. Also there was order given to the Pretor of the City, for to writ unto the Cost and give them to understand, that the Senat thought it meet and reason, that the subitary souldiers (who were enrolled in balt for the fuddain tumult and slarm thould with all freed be licensed to depart. The same year the colony of Graviles was planted in the tetritory of Talloan, which in times past was conquered from the Tarquinians; and five acres of land was fet out to every man. The M Triumvirs who had the charge thereof to distribute these lands, were C. Calpurnian Rife. P. Claus ding Pulcher, and C. Terentius Ilina. A yeer it was of note, in regard of the drought that happed, and the dearth of corn and all other fruits of the earth. For recorded it is, that in fix month ipace it never rained one drop.

The same year it fortuned, the ascertain plow-men and labourers plowed and digged somewhat deep within the ground, in the lands of L. Retilies a feerestry, (which lands lay under the hill Laniculum) there were found two coffers of flone, each of them about eight foot long and four foot broad, the lids and covers whereof were bound and lodered with lead. Both thele chells had a supericription upon them in Greek and Latine letters to this effect. That in the one of N them lay, buried Numa Pompilian the ion of Pompe, fometime King of Rome: and in the other, were belto wed the books of the laid Name. The owner of this ground opened thele coffers by the advice and council of his friends , and that which carried the title and infeription of the Kings lepulture, was found empty, without any flew or token of the reliques of a mans body or any thing clie, by realog the bones and all were rotten and confumed, in continuance of time after to many years palt. In the other were found two fardels, wrapped within wax candles (or car-cloths) containing either of them leven books; which were not only whole and found, but Min teemed very fresh and new. One leven of them were written in Latin, as touching the Pontificiall law : the other leven in Greek, entituled. The discipline or dollrine of Philosophie, inch as thoir dates might, afford Kalarine Amine laith morgover, That they were the books of Pathagoras; O according to the common received opinion of Name, that he was the disciple of Pythagoras ; hercin giving gradit to a probable line, relembling estuth. These books were first read by those triends of his who were prefere strong strong whereahe chells were opened; but afterwards as they came into more mens, hands to he read, it chanced that Q Periline the lord chief justice of E City, deficousto perule those packs, borrowed them of L. Periline, with whom he was familiarty, acquainted, by reason that the abovenemed Quinens Periling had chosen the forelaid Lucius anto the decury of the Seribes and feerestries. Who after he had read the titles with the funtheries

A and contents of every chapter, and finding the mish part thereof, tending directly to hollin the faccontents or over y customer and and onto L. Perdiss, that he purposed to filing those books into the fire; before he did so, he would permit him to use what means he thought by order of law or otherwise would serve his turn to recover the faid books out of his things, and good leave he fhould have to take that course without his displeasure, or any breach of friendship between them. The Scribe or notary aforesaid goeth to the Tribunes for their assittance, the Tribunes put the matter over to the Senat, before whom the Pretor faid plainly, that he was ready totake his corporall oath, if it were to put to it, that those books ought neither to be read nor kept. Whereupon the Senat judged, that for such a matter the offer only of the Pretors outh was sufficient, and that the books should be burned with all speed possible in the open place of affemblies called B Committees but they awarded withall, that they should be paied unto Q. Petilius the right owner as much mony for the books, as the Pretor and the more part of the Tribunes of the Commons esteemed them worth. The Scribe would touch none of mony : but his books were burnt in the fortaid place before all the people in a light fire, made by the ordinary fervitors attending upon the facrifices.

The same summer there arose suddainly a great war in the higher Spain. The Celtiberians had eathered a power of five & thirty thousand men, a number more then lightly at any time pefore they had levied. Now was Q. Fulvius Flacens lord Deputy of that province. He for his part, becaule he was advertiled that the Celtiberians put their youth in arms, had railed and affembled as great sids of the confederats, as he could, but nothing came he neer to the enemie in numbers C of fouldiers. In the beginning of the Spring he led his army into Carpetania, and encamped before the town Ebura, after he had plainted a mean garrison within it. A few daies after the Celtiberians pitched their tents within two miles from thence, under a little hill. When the Roman Pretor perceived they were come, he fent his brother Marcus Fulums with two companies of the horsemen of allies in espita, to view the enemies camp, willing him to approach as neer to the erench and rampier as he could, and to fee what compatte the camp took, but to forbear skirmiffiand in any hand to retire, in case he perceived the Cavalry of their enemies made out against him. According to this direction, in did in every respect. And so for certain dates together, there was nothing done, but only these two companies of horsemen shewing first, and afterwards retiring back fo toon as the Calvalry of the enemies iffued out of their camp. At length the Celtiberians ri also cause forth and advanced forward withall their power; as well horse as foot, and having fee them in ordinance of battell, flaied as it were in the midft between. The whole ground was imooth and even plain, fit to join a battell in. There ftood the Spaniards (11ay) expecting their enemies : But the Roman P recor kept his men within the rampier four d'aies together ; and they likewife of the other fide held the fame place still in battell array. The Romans all that while Rigged not a foot. The Celtiberians then feeing the enemies refuled fight, field themselves quiet also within their camp : only the horsemen rid forth; and they kept acorps de gward, to be in readiness if peradventure the enemies should be busic and come abroad. Both of the one side and other, they went out of the back fide of their camp to purvey forage and fuel, and impeached not one another. The Roman Pretor, supposing now that after so many dates relt, the enemies were E born is hand and hoped fully, that he would never begin first, commanded L. declini to take with him the left wing of the Cavalry, and fix thousand of the provincial auxiliaries, and to feach a compasse about the hill which stood behind the enemies; and from thence to foon as they heard a Cry, to run down amain and charge upon their camp. And because they might not be discoverred, in the night time they departed. Flaces, the next morning by peep of day, fent out C. Sorthaniss (a colonel of the allies) against the enemies camp, with the extraordinary hortemen of the left wing : whom when the Celtiberians beheld both approaching neer toward them & also more in number then usually they had been, they put forth all their Cavalry at once out of the gates : & withil, gave the figual to the Infantry allo to come abroad. Scribeniat, according to the direction given, to food as ever be heard the first noise and shout of the bottemen surned the head of his horse and rented back full upon the camp ; therewith the enemies followed more freely i firth the horimen, and within a while the footmen also, making full account to be matters of the Roman leaguer that day, and verily now were they put pall half a mile. When Flacous supposed that they were trained far enough from their camp, for fuctouring it, he lifted forth at once in three places, with his army arranged before in order of battell within, and caused them to let up-a mighty-cry, not only to somat the fouldiers to the con bat, but allo that their fellows behind the hill might hear it. Who made no ftay; but prefently ran down and let upon the energy mice camp as they had in charge, where there were left to guard not above five hundred armed men. By reason theretore, that they within were so few, the enemies without so many, and C the emesprise to inddein and unlooked for, they were mightily terrified, and to in manner with out any, skirmith and refiftance at all, their hold was forced, and won. Acidia' let on fire that out any surmain and remande at any that note was roscen and won. Actions let on fire that partially which might easieff be feen of them that were lightling in the plain. Now, the Celtiberia are which though behind in the rereguard, were the first that discovered the finne, but afterwards it, was moded and want current through the main battel, that their camp were lock and all on a light, fire. The enemies were greatly amated, but the Romans much more appointed. For now they might hear the thout of their fellows, having the upper hand, now might they see the seasof their enumies burning with bright himsel. The Celtibertans for a while thou in halpenee, doubtfull what to do ; but afterwards, perceiving they had no proce of tate reteat, if upon their pr difcommure they fheuld fall to running away, they faw no other hope but in fighting it eur, and to they began to renew the skirmith afreth, with more refolution then before. Freiecely they were encountred and charged in the midft of their battel by the fitt legion : but against the left flank and wing, where they faw the fouldiers of their own nation ranged (who came to aid the Remans) they made head, and advanced their enfignes with more boldnette and confidence. And serily that left wing of the Romans was at the point to have retreated, but that the leventh legion feconded and succoured them and withall they that were left within Ebar ain gairsion, came from the town in the very midft and hottelt of the conflict; and Acidus from another part placed on their backs. Down went the Celtiberians along time, and were cut in peeces between, As many as remained, made thift to flie and escape on all hands into every quarter. The Cavairy was , fent out after them two waies in severall bands : who also committed a great slaughter and execution. That day were flain of the enemies about 23000 4800 taken pritoners, with five hundred horse and above; besides 88 military ensignes gotten from them and carried away. A great victory this was, but not without bloudfhed of the Romans part : for of two legions there died iomewhat more then two hundred, but of Latine allies 830; of forrein aids, much about 2400 loft their lives in the field. The Pretor then retired with his victorious army into his own camp. Acidina was commanded to shide still in that of their enemies, which he had forced and won. The next more row they fell to gather up the spoils of their enemies : and those who had born themseives valiantly in that fervice among the reft, were rewared with gifts in a full and frequent affembly of the whole army. After this, when the hurt and maimed were brought back into the town Ebura, the K legions were led through the countrey Carpetania, towards Contrebia. This City When it was once besieged sent to the Celuberians for succour; but they came not in time : not for any stacknels of their part, but because after they were departed from home, & had entred on their jour ney, the foul wates hindred and staid them, which they were not able to pats for the continual rain that fell over and befides, the waters were out and the rivers swelled to high, that possibly they could not come forward : whereupon the befieged inhabitants being in dispair of help, from their friends, rendred the town. Flaceus likewile was torced by the ftorm and tempeftuous westher to put his army into the same City. Now the Celtiberians, who were on foot in their journey, and not aware that their friends had intrendred, at length having passed over the rivers (when the rain gave over and the weather took up) came to Contrebia ; but feeing no camp without the L wals, and improfing that it was either removed to the other fide, or the enemies diflodged and gone, they apposched the town, and marched loofely and retchiefly forward in difarray. The Roma ns fallied out upon them at two gates, fell upon them (disbanded as they were) and put them to the rout. But fee what happed ! that thing which hindred them that they could not make head, refift, and tettle themselves to begin fight (namely, because they came not together in one entire band, nor yet by great companies about their colours) the fame flood them in good flead to fave many of their lives that fled. For they ran to feattering, and were fo spread all over the planes, that in no place could the enemy meet with them in any number thick together, to compass them about on every side Howbeit , 2000 of them were killed, & above 5000 taken priloners, besides 400 horse, 62 ensigns of war won from them. Those who after their straggling slight retired homeward, met with another troop of Celtiberians coming forward, unto whom they recounted the yeelding up of Controbia and their own misfortune: by which means they canted them to turn and goe back againe, who immediately flipt away in their villages and forts, Then Flacens departed from Contrebia, and conducted his legions through Celtiberia wafting and spoiling as he went : where he forced many castles unttil the greater part of that countrey was reduced under his obedience. There affairs passed in high Spain that year. As for the lower province, Manlins the Pretor fought fortunatly in certain battells against the Portu-

The same yeer a Colony of Latins was pl nted in Aquileta, within the territory of the Ganls, and thither were conducted three thousand footmen, and every one of them were endowed N with fifty acres of land. The Centurions belides had a hundred, and the horiemen a bundred and forty acres specce given unto them. And the Commissioners for this conduct and distribution were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manisus Acidinus. In which year also two Temples were dedicated, the one to Venns Ergeina neer the gate Collina (which L. Porcine Licinius the for of Lucius dedicated being a Duunvir deputed for that purpose, and had been vowed before by L. Percias the Conful in the Ligurian war) the other to the goddels Piery, in the herb market : and of this chappell M. Acilim Glabrio the other Duumvir, had the dedication ; where, he erected and fet up in the honor of his father Glabrio, a guile fratue, which was the first gilded image that ever was made in Italy. This Glabrio the father was he, who had vowed to edific the faid Temple that very day on which he fought the battell against K. Amiochus at Ther- O mopple, and by warrant from the Senar, had bargained for the building thereof at a price. In thole daies wherein thele holy houles were conferrated, L. Emplous Patilas the Proconful, triumphed over the Ligurans ligatines. He had them before him in thew five and twenty golden Coronets, and befides them there was no gold or filver elle carried in that triumph. But many principal Ligurians, men of mark, whom he took captive ; were led before his chair. He dean among his fouldiers, 300 Affer specce. The fame of this triumph of his, was much mere recemed by this occasion, that the Lightian Embassadors craved to have a perpetual prace with the Romans A Waying. That their whole nation were resolved never to take arms again, but by commandment # and licence of the people of Rome. C. Fabia, the Pretos, returned this antiwer unto them by the *and inconce of the people of the was no towards hear this limiting from the Lighting; but it flood whem upon and was beforeign rather? To carry a new limit, and the limit agreeable to their the people of the control for a much as the Senar would believe none but the word only of the Confuls in the behalf of the Ligorians, as touching their true and lifteere meaning to observe peace. Thus was peace concluded with the Ligurians : but there was a battel fought in Corfes with the Islanders there : in which M. Pinarius the Pretor flew 2000 of them in the field : which defeat compelled them to give holtages, and belides 100000 pound weight of wax. From thence the army was conduct-B ed into Sardinia, where passed some fortunat battels against the Ilians, a nation at this day not follly quieted & appealed lothis very year also were the hundred holtages rendred back egain to the Carthaginians; with whom the people of Rome made and maintained peace, as well for their own part, as in the behalf of K. Mafaniffa, who at that time with an armed garifon, held the poffeision of that territory which had been in question. The Confuls in their province satsfill and had nothing to do. M. Babins was ient for to Rome, against the generall assembly for the election of magi-Strates : who created Confuls, A. Posthumus Albinus Lascins and C. Calpurnius Pilo After this. were elected Pretors T.b. Sempronius Gracebus, A. Post humins Albinas, P. Cornel. Mamerein. T. Minutius Mollicubui, A. Hoftilius Mancieus, and C. Manius; and they all entred into their magittracy upon the 15 day of March,

In the beginning of that yeer wherein A. Posthumias Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Pife were

Contuls : A. Posthumius the Conful brought into the Sen t those persons who were come from O Fulvius Flaceus out of the hither province of Spain; to wit, L. Minntins his Lieutenant generall, and the two colonels, T. Manins and L. Massaliora. There men after they had made report of two fields fortunatly fought against the Celtiberians, of their countrey yeelded and brought under their subjection; and that the term of government in that province was expired, and no more left to to be done there to as there was no need either of the ordinary mony which was wont to be fent for fouldiers pay, or of corn to be caried unto the army for that yeer: requelled of the Senar first, in regard of their happy successe, to yeeld bonor and praise to the immortali gods: and then, that Q. Fulvins might depart and come his water out of the province, and bring with D him that army of his from thence, whole vali int fervice, both himfelf and also many Pretors before him had used : which (say they) was not only meet and convenient, but also requisit and needfull in a manner to be done : forsimuch as the fouldiers were fo fliffnecked and oblinat, that it feemed unpossible to hold them any longer in that province, but that they would be gone and depart without licence, if they were not dimitted or elle break out into some dangerous fire of a mutiny, if a man should go about to keep and hold them back by strong hand. The Senat gave order that Ligaria (hould be the province for both Confals: which done, the Pretors also cafe lots for theirs. To A. Hofiling fell the civill jurifdiction over the citizens : and to Minuting over the forrainers; P. Cornelius had the government of Sicily: C. Manins of Sardinia. Unto E. Pofthumins was allotted the farther part of Spain, and to Tib. Sempronius the hither . This Sem-E promiss (because he was to succeed Q. Falvins) fearing his province should be left naked and disfarnished of the old souldiers," I demand (qd. he) of you, O L. Minusius, since you bring word "that there is no more trouble behind of that province, whether you think that the Cekiberians "will continue fall in their alleageance for ever, fo as that province may be protected and held "in obedience without any army at all? And if you cannot undertake to a flute us of the faith and 'loyalty of thele Barbarians & do advice us in any hand to maintain an army in thole parts, whe-"ther you will give countell to the Senat, for to fend a supply into Spiin, that they only should be " caffed and discharged, who have served out their full yeers required by law, and so that new and " raw fouldiers be mingled with the relt of the old or that the old legions thould full and whole se be removed out of the province, and new legions enrolled, and fent thirher in their flead? con-F " fidering that the finall account that plually is made of furthfresh and untrained fouldiers, were " enough to induce and move even the more quiet and peaceable fort of Barbarians to rebel and "make war again ? Soon faid it is, but not fo cafily done, to have made an end of all troubles fo "fuch a province, especially where the people are naturally inclined to war, and prone ever and " anon to make infurrections. Some few Cities, as far as I can ficat, and namely, those which be-"ing neer unto the fouldiers lying in winter garrison, were by them held in aw and kept down, "have yeelded and are become subject; but they that were farther off, be in arms still and have " weapon in hand. Which being to, I rellyon (my LL) even now before hand, that I will per-" form my service to the Commonweal, with the help of that army which is there already at this G a prefentibut in cale Flacous bring away those legions with birn! will chuse those qui rters which

"are in peace, to winter in, and not hazard my yong and new fouldiers among them, to be pre-

" fented to the devotion and mercy of most sierce and warlike enemies. The Lieutenant answere'ed to thefe demands in this maner, That meither himfelf nor my man elfe was able for his life, to

"divine and foredeem what was in the hearr of the Celtiberians now, and what they would

"mind and intend to do hereafter : and therefore he could not deny, but the better policy it was to fend an army among these Berbatians peaceable though they seemed to be at this present because as yet they are inpred to government, and cannot well skill of being subjects. But whether H is the more expedient to employ new forces, as the old, it is for him to theak and fet down who t the more expenience employ new locally the Celtiberians wil carry them telves in time of perce, and its withall affored, that the fouldiers will hold them content and quiet, if they be defined any longer in the province. But if a man may conjecture and give a gueffe what they think in their heart, either by their grumbling words fecielly one to mother; or their speeches nitered din the prefence and hearing of their General, when he maketh orations to them in publick andies ence & I tell you truly they have cryed out with oren mouth, that either they will keep their Gen nerall with them in the province, or home they will with him into Italy. This debate between the Pretor and the Lieutenant, was interrupted and broken off, by a new matter propounded before the Senat by the Confols, who thought it meet and reasonable, that order should be taken for I their own furniture and fettn g forth with men, mony, and munition to their provinces, before any thing were spoken or treat of as touching the Pretor his army. So, ordained it was, that the Coff. should have their entire army of new souldiers, to wit, each of them two legions of Rom. citizens with their cavalry, together with the usuall and accustomed number at all other times of Latine allies, namely, 15000 foot and 80 0 borfe. And with this power they had in charge to make war against the Ligurian Apuans. As for P. Cornelius and M. Babins, they continued fill in place of command : and were willed to hold their provinces, untill the Confuls were thither come. Then they were commanded to discharge the army which they had, and so to return to Rome, After this, speech there was concerning the army of Tib, Sempronins; and the Confuls had warrant to enroll one new legion, confilting of five thouland and two hundred foot and 400 K horfe: ove and besides, 1000 footmen, and 50 horie of Roman citizens. Likewife the Latine pation was charged with a levy of 7000 foot and 300 horse. With which army it was thought good. that T.b. Sempronius should go into the higher province of Spain. As for Q. Fulvius, he was permitted to bring back with him (if he thought well thereof) all those fouldiers, as well Romans as allies, which had been transported over into Spain before the Consulfhip of Sp. Polibnmins and Q. Martins : and more then that (after a new jupply was come) the jurplulage in two legions above 1400 foot, and 600 horse, and the over-plus of 12000 footmen of Latins, and fix hundred horsemen; and namely, those whose valorous servince C. Fulvius had tried and found in two battelsagainst the Celviberians. Moreover, solemn processions and thanksgiving were by authority ordained, for his happy managing of the affairs of the Common-weal; & then the rest of the Pre- L tors were fent into their provinces, Q. Fabins Butes had his commission renewed to govern Gallia flill. Thus it was agreed in the Senat-houle, that there should be eight legions maintained and kept in pay that yeer, over and above the old army in Liguria, which was in good hope shortly to be dismiffed. Howbeit even the fe forces (being no greater then they were) hardly could be made full and compleat by reason of the pestilence which now three years had raigned, and dispeopled the City of Rome and all Italy. During which plague the Pretor T. Minutine, and not long after him, the Coolal C.Calpurnius died : with many other brave and famous persons of each degree and quality. So, as at length these men began to hold this depopulation and calamity for a prodicioustoken and ftrange wonder. Whereupon C. Servillius the Arch-bifhop was charged, to learch out means for to appeale the wrath and anger of the gods; and the Decemvirs likewile to perule M the books of Sibylla: the Cof, to vow certain prefents and oblations, to Dan Apollo, Efentapius and Lady * Salus, and to let up their images garnished with gold : which he vowed and creded accordingly. The Decemvirs proclamed supplications & praiers two daies together for the health of the people, throughout the City, and in all market towns and places of frequent refort and afsembly. Al above twelve yeers of age, wore chaplets & garlands of flours upon their heads, & bare branches of lawred in their hands, whiles they were at their praiers & devotion Moreover, there was crept into mens heads a suspicion that some devilish and wicked hand might be the cause of all this. Wherupon by an act of the Senar, a commission was granted our unto C. Clandins the Pretor (who was lubstituted and chosen in the room of T. Minutins) to make learth and diligent inquili ion after all confections of poilon, & the practilers therof, within the City, & for the compais N of ten miles about it every way : In like maner, to C. Manins, for to fit in the enquiry therof before he croffed over-lea into his province of Sardinia) in all the mart-towns and places of affembly which were more then ten miles off, from Rome. Of all others, the Conful his death was most suspected. For given out it was, that Quarta Hoftdia bis wife, had murdered him : but when be was feen once, that her own ton Q. Fulvius Flaceus, was declared Conful in place of his father in law and mothers husband, the death of Pilo the Conful began to be more infamous and impicious a great deal then before. And witnesses there came forth ready to depose, that after Albinus and Pife were pronounced Confuls (in which election the laid Flaceus was rejected and fuffered a repulle) his mother reproached him therewith, and laid it in his difh, that this was the third time that he fued for the Confulship and gone without I adding moreover, and willing him to be ready to fland for it again, for that the would work and bring it about, that within two months he should be Consul. Among other testimonies and depositions making for the cause and tending to the tame, that speech of hers also, taking effect too truly and so just within the time, was thought lufficient to condemn Hoffilia.

In the beginning of this ipring, whiles the levy of fouldiers staied the new Could at Rome, whiles the death of the one and the choosing of the other into their place, caused all thing there

A to go more flowly forward; in the mean time P. Cornelius, and M. Bebine who had done nothing worthy of the remembrance during the Confalthip, led their armies against the Ligarian Appara These Ligarians, who before the coming of the Coulus into the province looked for no war. were furprized at mawares, and to the number of $2000 of them yeelded : whom Corneling and Babins refolved (upon advice had first with the Senat by letters) to transport from the mountains, into plains and champian countrey from their own home; to the end they should have no more hone to return , for other wife they supposed the Ligurian war would never have an end. Now there was in the Samnits country a certain territory belonging in common to the people of Rome. which sometimes had been in the renure and possession of the Taurasins. In which place they being defirous to plant the Ligurian Apuans, published an edict, That they should descend down R the mountains Anidos, together with their wives and children, and bring away with them all that ever they had. But the Lighrians ient their Embassadors oftentimes to intreat, that they might not be forced to abandon their domestical gods, the place of their nativity, and the feonchres of their anceltors; and therewith promited to deliver up their armor, and to put in holtages. Howbeit, feeing they could not prevail, and having not firength and power enough to wage war again, they obeyed the edict and proclamation. So there was translated from thence at the publick charges of the City, to the number of four thousand persons free born, together with their women and children : and unto them was allowance made of 150000 Sefterces, toward the building of new houses. And for to distribute and divide land among them, the same men(to wit, Cornelius and Babius) had commission , who also removed them into these parts. Howbeit at C the request of these twain, there were Quinquevirs or five commissioners assistants granted unto them by the Senar, by whose advice they might manage all. These affairs being finished, after they had brought with them to Rome their old army, they obtained of the Senat a grant to triumph. And there were the first that ever triumphed &made no war before. Only the enemies were led in thew before their chariot; for nothing had they gained and won for to be carried or led in pompe neither was there ought to be feen in their triumphs, which might be dealt and given among the The same yeer Fulvius Flaceus the Pretor in Spain, by occasion that his successor staved long ere he came into the province brought forth his army into the field out of his wintring camp, and began to wast and spoil the farther parts and territories of Celsiberia: from whence the inhabin tants came not in to submit and do their homage and fealty. By which deed of his, he rather provoked and angred the barbarous people, then terrified them : for when they had fecretly gathered together certain forces and companies, they belet and barred the passage Maulianum, by which they were affured that the Roman army would paffe. As L. Posthumius Albinus was upon his journey into the nether province of Spain; Gracebus his colleague charged him to advertile Quinthis Fabine for to bring his army to Tarracon, for that he proposed there to discharge his old fouldiers, to diffribute the supply which he brought, & to range in order al his army by companies. Notice also was given to Flacens of the very day (which was neer at hand) upon which his successor would come. This new occurent caused Flacens to lay alide those enterprises which he intended. and in all half to withdraw his forces out of Celtiberia. The barb rous people knowing not the a cause hereof, but supposing that he had some inkling of their revolt, and how they had in secret taken arms, and that thereupon he was fore affraid, guarded and stopped the passage to much more streightly. Now to soon as the Roman army was entred into the passe one morning becimes at the break of day, the enemies arole inddainly at once out of two parts, and charged the Romans: which when Flacens perceived, he gave commandment by the ministery of the Ceturious, that every man should keep his place and stand his ground, to have his arms and weapons in readinesse; by which means he appealed the tun ult and affright in his holt. Then after he had brought all his labouring bealts with the baggage, unto one place, he embattelled and put in array all his bends and companies, parely by himtelf in person, and partly by his Lieutenants and colonels, according as the ground and the time required, shewing no sign at all of fear, but putting F his men in mind of the enemies, in these terms : " Ye have (quoth be) to do with those thet "twice already yeelded have yeelded unto us, who are inured and practifed still in wickedness & "perfury; not bettered in vertue and courage a thole (I fay) who are like to make our return home "honorable and glorious, which other wife would have been obscure and nothing memorable : fo sas we shall carry to Rome for a triumpn, our swords all bloudy and newly bashed in the green "wounds and fresh massacre of our enemies; and beare away the spoils of their bodies, all ems brued and fall dropping with their bloud. Time would not permit him to tay any more for now the enemies advanced for ward, and the charge was already given in the utmoftskitts of the army, and anon the main battels encountred and joyned conflict. The fight was bee and cruell alike in all G parts, but the fortune divers : for the Roman legions in the main battell fought valiantly, and the two wings of either hand did their devoir as bravely. The auxiliary strangers had to deal with enemies armed in deed at all points like to them elves, but better fouldiers by ods then they were in such fort; as they were over-charged by them, and couldnot make good their ground. The Celtiberians perceiving they were not able to match the legions in ranged battell and close bandfight, cast their companies into a pointed and coin-formed battaillon, for to pierce perforce and enter upon their enemies in which maner of fight they are to ftrong, that it is not possible to withftand them, wherefover they give their violent charge. And then the legions also were put in difarray, and the whole main battel after atort, was dishandened and broken. Which diforder and fear-H full-trouble when Flacene perceived he rode a gallop to the legionary men of arms : What ? (od. he unto them) is there no beln at all in you ? and shall this army here be thus defeated utterly and come to nought, Wherem they seyed on all hands to him to give direction and ipeak only the word what he would have done, & be should fee how, they would belier themselves in the execution of his command. " Mary (quoth be) double your troops, you that are the horfemen of two "Vegions, and run your horses with full carrier against that wedge formed battailon of the ene-"mies, where with they preficupon our men ; and this shall you perform with the more violence of your horses, if you dishridle them and let them have full head, and so set spurs and suff in a "mong them ; which we have read in stories, that the Romans many a time have practifed to "their great praise and honour. No fooner faid, but done it was pluckt were the bridles over their horse beads; twice they ran through the mids of them to and fro from one fide to another. brake all their lances upon the enemies, overthrew them, and made foul work and flaughter among them. When this pointed battaillon of the Celtiberians was once broken, (even the whole and only hope they had;) then they began to fear and tremble, then were they at the point to quit the fight, and to look about them which way to take their flight. The extraordinary Cavala ry in the out-wings(leeing to brave a fervice performed by the Roman horimen) were enkindled and incented by their valorous example, and of their own accord without attendance of any mans commandment; charged upon their enemies, thus disordered and in disarray already. Then the Celtiberians ran away and fled on all hands. The Roman General feeing them once turn back and shew their hin-parts, vowed to build a chappell to Fortuna equestris, and to exhibit games K in the honor of Iap. Opt. Man. The Celtiberians, thus disbandoned and feattered in the rout all over the length of the streight passage, were killed and cut in peeces. It is recorded that there died that day feventeen thouland enemies, and were taken priloners alive more then three thoufand, together with 27 field entigns, and well neer eleven hundred hories. For that day, the victorious army lodged within no campatall: yet was not this victory to cleer, but it colt them the loffe of some souldiers : for of the Romans were flain four hundred seventy and two; of allies and namely of Latins) 1019; and together with them, aidfouldiers three thousand. Thus the army having by this good hand recovered their ancient honor and glory, was conducted to Tarracon. Tak: Semproniusthe Pretor, (who was arrived two daies before) went out to meet Fulvius in the way as he came, and shewed how he rejeyced on his behalf, for this good managing and L happy atchieving the affairs of the commonweal . Which done, they agreed together with great accord as touching the fouldiers, namely, whom to casse and send away, and whom to retain ftilin fervice. Then Fulving having shipped the fouldiers that were discharged, took his journey to Rame: and Semprenius conducted the legions, into Celeiberia.

- Both the Comuls led their forces into Ligaria, and entred the countrey in two divers quarters. Post burnius with the first legion and the third, befet and invested the two mountains, Balista and Suifmentium, and to streightly he kept the narrow passes of those parts with his garrisons, that be cut them off from all victuals, and tamed them with extream fearcity and want of all things, Eulvius with the second legion and the fourth, after be had assailed the Appan Ligurians from the coast of Pifa, received submission and homage of as many of them as inhabited about the river M Magra; and when he had embarked upon feven thousand of them, be sent them over to Naples, coasting along the Tuscan sea. From whence they were brought into the Samnita countrey, and a centain territory assigned them to inhabit amongst the rest of thir countrymen. As for A. Posthymins, he cut down the vineyards, and burnt the corn of the Ligurian mountainers, so long untill they were driven by all maner of calamities following war, to come in and submit, yes, and to deliver up their armor and weapons. From thence Postbamins departed and took the fes, because he would visit the coasts of the Ligurian Ingaunes and Internelians. Now, before that these Confuls came to the army which was appointed to meet at Pife, it chanced A. Pofthumius & M. Futvins Nobilior, the brother of Q. Fatvins, were the commanders, and had the conduct thereof. N This Falvine was a Colonell of the fecond legion, who during the time of those months, wherein by turn he had the command and charge thereof, dimiffed that legion, having bound the Centutions by an oath, that they should make paiment back of their wage-mony well and truly to the Questors in the chamber and treasury of Rome. Notice hereof being given to An. Posthamminiat Placentia, (for thither it happed that he was gone) he rode after those casted fouldiers, and purfued them with a company of light borfemen. As many of them as he could overtake, after he had onesked and rebuked them for their fank, he brought to Pife; of the reft he gave information to the Conful. Who put the matter to queltion, and after it had been debated in council, an act of the Senat passed against the said M. Fulvius, that be should be confined and sent into Spain beyond new Carthage. And letters he had given him to carry from the Conful to P. Manlins into the farther province of Spain. As for the fouldierst, hey were commanded to return again to their colours, andifor an ignominious difgrace of that legion, ordained it was, that for a full years pay they should be content and take up with him months wages. And look what souldiers repaired not to the army accordingly, the Comul had warrant and commission to make sale of him and all that be had.

The lame yeer L. Duronius, who was returned with ten ships to Brandusium from out of Illyricum (where he fat as Pretor the former ver) leaving his fhips there in the rode, came to Romes

A where, in discoursing of the acts by him done, he laid the whole fault of all the recovery and piracy at lea upon. Gentine the King of the Illyrians, faying, that all the thips which had lien troon the coast of the Adriatick fea, came out of his reasm. For which he had fent Embassadors to complain, but they could never find means to speak with the King about it. Now they were Embalfadors arrived at Rome from Geneius, who avouched, that when the Romans came for to parle with the King, he hapned to be fick in the most remote parts of his kingdome and theriore General timetheir King and mafter requested the Senat, not to give credit to those falle accusations and forged flanders which his enemies had raifed and informed sgainst him. But Daronia alledged moreover, that divers and fundry persons, as well citizens of Rome as Latine allies within his dominion, hadreceived many wrongs: yea, and by report certain Roman citizens were stated and B detained at Coregra. Whereupon it was in councell thought good that they should be brought to Rome, and that G. Clandins the Pretor should have the hearing of the matter, before such time no answer would be given unto King Gentins or his Embailadors. Among many othersthat the plague this yeer confumed, certain priests and prelats also died. and namely, L. Valerius Flacens, a bishop, in whole room was cholen Q. 1Fabins Labeo, Alio P Menlins one of three Triumvirs for the celebration of the holy feafts. In whote flead Q. Fulvi. Manifest one of the case was elected Triumvir. He was at that time very* yong, and not out of his embrodered Prataxes. But as touching the King of facrificers, who was to be choten in place of Ch. Transaction Cornelini Dolobella, there was debate between C. Servilius the Archbishop, and Cornelius Do. that he was Lobella one of the Duumvirs for the navy. For when the bishop would have had him to resign that underty, yeers C which cause the bishop fet a round fine on the Dunmvir his head. Then Dolabella appealed to the this word in ? people; and before them it was to be tried, whether the faid fine should be taken off or paied? Now the end of the when most of the tribes called into the rails for to give their voices, advited the Dummvir to obey == book : for When most of the world difference be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that Pretease was the bishop, and a warded the fine to be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that Partial basings the bishop has been able to be a basing Partial basings. office which he had, behold it lightned at the very instant from heaven, which is the only ominous Trains 12. fien that interrupteth the assemblies of the people. Whereupon the Collede of the bishops made lib, and upon feruple of conscience to inaugurate Dolabella, but they consecrated P. Classias Sieulus, who had this is should been jured in the fecond place. The fame year granted it was to the inhabitants of Camer, at their own request and petition, that they might commonly speak Latine : as alio to the publick criers, to make portiale of goods in the Latine tongue. The Senat gave thanks to the Pifans for the offer they made of lands, wherein to plant a Colony of Latins, And three Triumvir s or Commissioners for that bufinels were created, namely, Q Fabius Enter, Marcus and Publins, both named Popilins, and both furnamed Lanas . Letters were brought from M. Manus. the Pretor (who having the government allosted unto him of Sardinia, had commission alto to n enquire after the practile of poyloning in all places, not within ten miles of the City of Rome inporting thus much, that he had condemned already 3000 persons, and the the informations and presentments multiplied daily, by reason of new matters discovered ftill, and therfore either he was to give over that inquilition, or to refign up his province Sardinia

Q. Fulvius Flacous returned out of Spain to Kome with great honour for his acts there atchieved. Who remaining yet without the City, because of his triumph, was created Conful with L. Manlins Acidimus, and within few daies after, rode triumphant into Rome, accompanied with histoaldiers, whom he had brought home with him. He carried in triumph a 120 * golden eoroners. Moreover in gold 31 pound weight, befides 173200 pecces of coin in Ofcan filver. He dealt to his fouldiers fifty Denarii peeces out of the booty and pillage which he had gotten. To every Centurion he gave it double, and to the gentlemen of Rome that ferved on horsback, trible. The like he did by the Latin allies, and to all in general he paied double wages. This year was the law first proposed by L. Inlines a Trib. of the Com. as touching the year of the age requisit and meet for to fue for any publick office, or to exercise the same. Fulvius the Copful, before that he went in hand with any at- H fairs of State, faid he would both discharge himself and also the City of the duty to Godward, in performing the vowes which he had made. He declared that on thet very day wherin he fought his laft battell with the Celtiberians, be had made a vow to exhibit games to the hotour of that most mighty and gracious god Jupiter, and likewise to build a temple to Fortuna equestris : and bow thereto the Spaniards had contributed certain forms of mony. So a decree patted, that those plaies should be let forth : and two Duumvirs chosen, to give order and bargain for the edification of the fame temple. Likewise there was set down a certain flint of mony to be disburfed for the defraying of the charges : to wit, not exceeding that find in the folemany of the plaits, which was allowed unto Fulvia: Nobilior, when he exhibited the like sports after the end of the Atolian war. Item, that for their games he should not feck or fend for, gather and raite, receive or do I any thing, contrary to the Act of the Senat, which in the time of L. Amplim and Cn. Babine Confuls was made as touching such passimes. This decree the Senat ordered, by occasion of the supersuous and excessive expenses emploied about the plaies of T. Sempronies the Edile; which were very chargeable not only to Italy and the Latine allies, but also to fortain provinces. The winter this year was very fharp, by reason of snow, and all manner of tempetituous weather. The trees that were tender and fubject to frolt and cold, were all blafted and killed ; befides the winter featon continued much longer then ordinary in other yeers. And thereupon the feltivall folemnity of the Latine holidaies were to troubled and difordered by a juddain and insupportable ftorm and tempest upon the hill [Alba] that by an ordinance of the Bishops, it was celebrated again the second time. The same tempest cast down certain images in the Capitol, and disfign. K red very many places with thunderbolts and flashes of lightning. It overthrew the temple of ?npiter in Tarracina, the white temple at Capua: Item, the gate there called Remana, and the batelements of the wals in divers places. Among these wondrous prodigies it was reported also from Reate, that a mule was foaled with three feet. For this cause the Decemvirs were commanded to go to the books of Sibylla: and out of that learning, they shewed to what gods factified should be made, & what number of beasts was to be killed. And because many places were with lightning defaced, they ordained that a folemn supplication should be holden one whole day in the temple of Jupiter. This done, the forelaid games and plaies which Q. Falving the Conful had vowed, were with great magnificence exhibited for ten daies together. After this followed the election of the Cenfors, wherein M. Emplins Lepidus the Arch-bifhop, and M. Fulvina No. L bilier, who had triumphed over the Ætolians, were created. Now between their two men, there had been notorious enmity, oftentimes tellified and shewed in many tharp and butter debates. both the Senat, and also before the people. When this election was ended, the two Centors according to the ancient nie and cultome, fat upon their ivory chairs of ethate in Mars field, neer the altar of Mars. The Latins & Sabins both, were fendenizend Romana. An old laying it is, and not foold as trues and for the truth become a common proverty, that empiries ought to be transferred and toon dir, whereas triendhip should "continue & live for gyer. At thele words, there arole a confused bruit, among them there allembled, intoken of their content and approbation : and anon were heard the diffinet voices of them all in general, craying and requesting of the Centors the fame; which making one entire found. brake off the speech of Metellas. Then Emplins among other matters complained that M. Faluis had twice pur him besides the Consulship, which other wife he was fore of. And Fulvius on the other fide found bimlelf grieved, that be evermore by Amplins had been provoked, and that he B had waged law by flipulation againft him to his dihonor and diffrace. Yet both of them made fair and shewed, that if the one were as willing as the other, they would relent and be over-ruled by fo many honorable personages of the City. So, at the instant request of all them that were present. they shook hands and thereby affored one another to forgive and forget all matters palt and truly to make an end of malice, and be perfect friends again : whereupon they were much commended by the whole affembly, and conducted by them into the Capitoll. Where the Senar approved and highly praised, as well the careful industry of the principal citizens, in effecting this to weighty a matter, as also the good nature and flexibility of the two Centors. Who afterwards when they required to have a certain fum of ofmony assigned unto them for to employ in the publickedifices and other works of the City, were allowed by their decree, the full rent and revenues of one whole yeer. The same yeer L. Posthumius and Tib, Sempronius the Pro-Pretors in Spain agreed so together that Albimus should make an expedition against the Vacces through Lussiania, and so return from thence into Celsiberia. But Gracehus went as far as the atmost quarter of Celsiberia, forthat in thole parts there was the greater war. And first he forced the City Munda, which he surprised

there, he went forward affaulting forts and burning the villages, until he come to another City of exceeding strength, which the Celtiberians call Certifina: where, as he was about to approach the wals with his engins of battery, there came unto him orators out of the City; who like good plain men of the old world, made a fpeech unto him, nothing diffembling but that they would war and be revenged, if their ftrength and forces were inflictent. For they requested leave to passe D to the Caltiberian camp, there to receive aid and fuccour, but if they could not speed, then they would confult part by themelves what to do. Good leave they had of Gracebus; and forne few daies after, they brought with them ten Orators more. About noone-tide it was of the day, and the first thing that they craved at the Pretor his hand was this, That he would make them to drink beforethey paried. When they had once quaffed and carowied round, they called again for more: whereat, all that were prefent and flood about them, laughed heartily to see them for rade and uncivil, and altogether without good manners. But afterwards, the eldelt man of the company began in this wife: We are lent (quoth he) unto you from our nation, to know what afficred means bath induced you to levy war againft us? To this demand Gracebus antwered, That be came with the confidence that he had in a brave and valiant army; which (if they were foldefi-E rous) he would do them the favour to fee, that they might be able to make more certain teport to their countrymen apon their own knowledge. And with that, he commanded the colonels and knight marfhals, to put to arms and embattell all the bands and companies, as well toot as toyle; and then armed as they were to charge one upon another in manner of a battel. These Builtaffadors after they had once feen this fight, were fent away : who went directly to the Celuberians their neighbors, and frighted them for lending any succour to the City belieged. The rownsmen Wildin having in vain let fire-lights in the night time sloft upon their mirets (which was the lighal agreed upon herwisen them) and feeing themselves defitted only hope they had of sid, welded by composition. So they were so joined to make painters of four and twenty honotred thousand Sefterces; and to deliver forty of their pobleft gentlemen and peff men of arms; nor by way of houses (for commanded they were to ferre in the wars); and yet in truth, they flood for pawn of affurance for their fealty. From thence anon he marched to the City Alco, where the Celuberians lay encamped and from whom of late the Embaliadors aforelaid came : whom, for certain daies be provoked to fight, making fmall skirmithes, by ferding our against their corps de fourd in higher armed vangueriers, to the end that scuffling together revery day more then other be might train them all forth of their camp at length. And when he perceived once that his delign had taken effect, becommanded the capeains of the auxiliary foulders, that after food thort skirmith, they thould make temblant as if they were overcharged with numbers, and to at once man their backs, and flie as fall as they could to their own camp : himfelf in the mean while put his men in battell erray within the rampier at every pare. Long it was not, but he might fee his own bands and companies retiring back on let purpole, and running away, and after them the harbarous enemies following as hard as they could inchate. Now that he will be sumy embarted. led for the purpose, and ready to receive them. and therefore he made un longer lay then only to tuffer his friends and allies to enter at liberty into the camp, but he fet up a loud cry, and at one initians iffued forth at all the gates. The enemies were not able to engine this unexpected wiolent charges and to they that were come to affail the camp of others, could not to much as defend their cwn : for prefently they were discomfitted and put to flight; and within awhilest driven for very fear into their hold, and in the end turned out of it alio, That day goes of this ince mies leit their carkales in the field, 320 were taken priforers, tegether with 112 borfe: & 14 field enfigns. Of the Roman army there died not above 109, Prefently after this battel, Graceby thingsh ed with his legions to walt and spoil the country of Celisberia : and 's the made harnethrell places as he went, with driving booties, & with harrying & carying all that ever he could rouse by , the Cities and States of the country, fome lubmitted willingly of their own accord; others for constraint & fear received the yoke of subjection; fo as in few daies space he became master at an 103 towns that yeelded unto him. A mighty rich pillage be gat in this expedition. After this he marched back again towards the City Ales from whence he came, and began to befiege and alfailthe town. The inhabitants endured the first affault of the enemies, but afterwards feethe their town not only affailed by force of arms, but also shaken with engins and instrumented battery, districting the strength of the City, they retired all within their fortresse: from where the to the end, (having fent their Orators before-hand)they & all that ever they had, were at thedevotion of the Romans. A great booty there was gotten, and many noble gentlemen taken prilonetis amongst whom were two sons and one daughter of Thurrus. This Thurrus was a prince and great lord of those parts, and simply the mightiest potentat of all the Spaniards by many degrees, who he ing advertised of the hard hap and calamity fallen upon his children, sent unto Gracchus into the camp for a fafe-conduct, and thither he came himfelf in person. And first he demanded, Whether he could grant unto him and his their lives? The Pretor answered, That they should live. Then he demanded again, if he might bear arms and serve under the Romans? and when Gracebus K permitted that also; Then will I follow you (quoth he) against mine old friends and allies, fince they dildain to respect and regard me. From this time forward he took part with the Romans: and in many journies he bare himfelf loislly and valiantly in their wars, and much advanced the Roman State. After this, Ergavica (anoble, rich and mighty City) affrighted at the calamities of other neighbor towns and States about them, fet the gates open for to receive the Romans. Some Authors have written, that their towns and Cities yeelded not bona fide and in fincerity of heart : but that fo foon as he had withdrawn the legions out of any quarter, fuddainly from that part they revolted : alfo, that afterwards, he fought a cruell battel neer the mountain Contain with the Celtiberians, from the break of day untill noon: in which conflict there were many fisin both of the one fide and the others neither did the Romans any other great deed (as they find L pole) at Ergavica that day to tellific their victory, but kept the field, and challenged them out of their camp to fight. Moreover, that the next morrow all the day long, they gathered up the foolis of the dead: & on the third day strook a second battel, which was greater than the other : & fifth at length, the Celtiferians without all doubt loft the field elections much as their camp was ranfacted ed, Furthermore, that there died of the enemies that day 22000, and not fo few as 300 taken bridfoners, and wel-neer as many horfe, besides the winning of 72 military ensigns : and so the war came to a finall end, the Celtiberians made peace indeed, continued falt and firm therein with all loyalty, and were not fo fickle & unconftant as before. They write moreover, that the fame fulfimer L. Post humins fought a brave battell with the Vacco, in the father province of Spain, where he pit to the I word 35000 enemies,& forced their camp. But it foundeth more like a truth, that he came M not timely enough into that province, for to perform any fuch exploits during that fammer featon?

The Centors made a review and new choice of Senators in good concord and faithfull muty: for the president of the Senat was chosen, M. Amplini Lepidus the Centor himself, who also was the high prieft or Arch-bithop. Three Senators were called and deprived their places: 600. Lepidus held some in, whom the colleague over-passed and left out. Of that portion of mony which out of the main allowance was divided between them, they canted their works following to be made. Lepidas for his part sailed the great cantey or what at Taracisa, which wis a peece of work nothing acceptable to the people, for that he had himfelf lands and polletsions there of this own, and teamed to sale his privat expenses, under colour of doing a publish work with the CIP ties mony. Whereupon three thousand and two hundred of the enemies, and all that quarter of Ligaria yielded anto him. Then the Conful placed these that had surrendered, in the plains and changean country, and planted garrifons upon the mountains. Letters hereof with great speed came to Rome: whereupon there were ordained processions for three daies. During which time of protethon, the Prators calebrated facrifices, and killed formy greater beatls. But the other Conful n A Mantina did no exploit worth remembrance in Ligaria. Three thouland Transalpine Frenchmen pasted over the Alps into Italy, in peaceable manner marching without any hostility of harm

This very year died Philip King of the Macedonians, worn away to nothing, partly, for age, and partly with grief of heart after the death of his fon Demetring. It fortuned that he kept his winter in Demetrias, commented with anguish of mind for the loss and miss of his son, disquiered with pe remote and repentance for his cruelty against him, which stong and pricked his guilty confeience Befides, he faw his other fon (who now was the undoubted heir apparant of the Crown, as well in his own opinion as in the conceit of others) how all: men turned their eyes and courted to him the confidered withall, how his old age was despised and forlorn; whiles some expected his death, others did not so much as look for it; which was the greatest grief and trouble of all other, And together with him, there was Antigonan the fon of Echecrates, bearing the name of his uncle Antigonus by the fathers fide, who had been guardian to Philip. A fidethe river " Ifer Now there were arrived before so advertise the Kipp hereof, Antigony and This Cotto was a nobleman among the Baffatniang And Antigonia was full against his will joyied in embaffage & fent with Cotto to raile the Baltarnians, Howbert, pot far from Amobination they met with news (but very uncestain) of the Kings deaths which occurrence from bled the whole course of their defigns. For thus it was complotted, that Philip should give the Baftaron fale palface through Thrace and find them victuals: to the effecting and performing whereof, he had entertained the peers and principall States of those quarters with presents, and assured them upon his fidelity, that the Bastarnians should pass through their country peaceably without any harm-doing Now his intent and full purpole was, to extinguish unterly the nation of the Dardanians and to plant the Bastarnians in their country, Hereby he aimed at a twofold commodity: Relie one was this; that the Dardanians (a people most malicious ever to the Macedonians, and who alwaies in time of the troubles and advertities of the KK, took their vantage to annoy them I might be rooted out : the other, that the faid B. ft. wine leaving their wives and children in Dardania, might be sent to waste and spoil Italy. Now were they to pass to the Adriatick sea and so to hali, by the way of the Scordifcians (for other way there was none to lead an army) and foor would they thought he grant passage unto the Baltarnians : for they differed not at all, either in language, or manners & fashions : and more than that, they were like enough to joyn with them in the expedition, feeing they went to the conquest and pillage of a most rich and wealthy nation. These designments were accommodated and fitted to whatevents soever should happen. For in cafe the Bastarnians should happen to be defeated by the Romans and put all to the sword; yet C this would be a comfort again; that the Dardanians were confumed from the face of the carth, that he should meet with a booty of that which the Bastarnians lest behind them; and finally, have the possession free and entire to himself of all Dardania. But in case their fortune wereto have the upper hand, then whiles the Romans were averted from him, and amnfed upon the war with the Baltarnians, he should be able to recover what soever he had lost in Greece. These had fieen the designs projected by K. Philip. So they entred peaceably, and marched without hostility, under the word and promile of Cotto & Antigonus, But fhortly after that news came of the death of Philip; neither were the Thracians so tractable and easie to be dealt withall in commerce and traffick: nor the Bastarnians could be content with that which they bought with their money, or be kept in order as they marched, but that they would break their ranks & turn out of the dis D rect way Hereupon they began to do wrong & injury on both fides one unto another: which encreating daily more & more to ourrages, kindled the fire of an open war. In the end, the Thracians norable to endure the violence & multitudes of their enemies, leaving their villages in the plains beneath, retired to an exceeding high mountain, called Donnea, To which place, when the Baffarmans would have gone: behold not withfranding they approached to the tops and ridge of the hils they were surprised with a storm, much like to that wherewith the Gauls (as it is reported) perished at what time as they were a spoiling and pilling the Temple at Delphi. For they were not only drenched first with showers of rain pouring upon them, pelied afterwards with thick storms of hailstones, strucken with great cracks of thimself, and blasted with gleams of lightning that dazled their eye-fight: but also the lightning flashed so upon them on every side, that it seemed they E were charged and thot directly against their bodies : so as not only the common fouldiers but alto the principal leaders and captains themselves were imitten down therewith and overthrown. Wherenpop when they were scattered & would have fied down the hill, from the exceeding freep tocks they tumbled down they knew not how with their treads forward, And albeit the Thracithis purified them thus cared and affrighted, yet they had nothing in their mouth, but That the gods forced tham to run away, and that the sky fell upon them. Being thus disparkled with this rempelitions florm, and returned asit were out of a thipwrack into the camp from whence they fer forth & most of them but half armed, they began to debate in councill what to do. There was noching in this arounds more memorable and worthy the noting, than this, that as it fell out he triumphed now the very fame day that he had the year before upon his Prestorthip. After his triumph, he published the general affembly for the election of Magistrats what cin were cleated Coli, M. Junior Braus, and A. MauliniVolfo. arrefted his body, and brought him into the Kings house; and when he had left him in the safe H cultody of certain persons, he went himself directly to Philip," It should seem to me, & if it please " your grace (quoth he) by many words which I have observed, that you would spend a great "deal to know the whole truth as touching your two ions, and be relolved whether of them er twain it was that laid wait to takeaway the life of the other. Now the only man of all other "that can undo the knot and clear this doubt, is in your hands forth coming, and that is Xychus. Herewith he advised the King to call before him the faid party fince that (as it fell out he was already brought into the Court. Sent for he was and presented before the King; and being asked the question he denied every thing at the first , but with such inconstancy, as it appeared evidently that upon some little fear of torture offered unto him, he would be ready to bewray all : for ar the very fight of the tormentor and the scourges, he relented. Then he disclosed and she wed in order the whole proceeding and manner of this wicked practice and villany, how it was wronght as well as by the embassadors as also by his own self their minister. Immediatly there were some of purpose sent to apprehend the said embassadors. And Philocles who was present in the way, they furprised and took of a sudden: as for Apelles (who had been sent to pursue one Chareas) being advertised how that Xyohus had bewraied & told all failed over into Italy. As concerning Philades. there is no certainty known. Some report, that at the beginning he denied the matter flourly: but after that Xychus was brought to his face and confronted him, he flood no longer in it. Others . say again, that being put to torture he endured the pains, and continued still in the deniall. Phi-Lips forrow and grief was by this means renewed and redoubled, reputing himself more unhappy in his fons, and his mifery the greater, in that one of them was now dead and gone, Perfeus being certified that all was discovered, took himselffor a greater and mightier person, than to sear and think it needfull for him to flie upon it. And therefore he fought only to keep far enough out of the way, purposing to stand upon his guard all the while that his father lived, and avoid the slaming fire (as it were) of his burning choler. Philip feeing that he could not possibly come by his person for to execute justice, thought upon that which only remained to be done, and studied how Perfeis besides impunity, should not be recompensed and rewarded also for that his wickedness, He called therefore Antigonas before him, unto whom he was bounden and beholden already, for bringing to light the unnaturall murder committed upon Demetrius his ion; and of whom he conceived this opinion, in regard of the fresh and late glory of his uncle Antigonus, that the Macedonians should have no cause to be assumed or repent, if they had had him for to be their K. L. And in this wife he brake with him: "Since my unhappy fortune is such (quoth he)O Antigonus, "that I ought (contrary to all other fathers) to wish my self childles; I have a mind and purpose "to make over unto you that kingdom, which I received at the hands of your uncle, which he " preserved and kept yea, and augmented for my behoof during the time of my nonage, & wherein (whiles I was under his guardianage) he bare himself not only valiant but also true and faith-"unto me. No man I have but you, whom I can effeem worthy to wear the Crown; and if I "knew of none at all, yet had I rather that both it and the Realm perished and were extinct for " ever than Perfeus should enjoy it as the guerdon of his ungracious & devillish fact. I shall ima-"gine yet that Demetrius is rifen from death to life, I shall think that I have the fruition of him " again if I leave you in this place, you, Isay, the only man of all others that wept for the death M "of the poor innocent young man, and lamented for my unhappy errour and unfortunat treipals. After this speech with Antigonus, he never reased to emercain and grace him in the face of the world with all kind of honour that he could devile. For iceing that Perfeus was in Thrace, Philip went in progress to every City of Macedony, and recommended Antigonus to all the Prices and and States thereof. And without all doubt, if God had given him longer life but a little, he would have enstalled him in full possession of the kingdom. Well, to return again unto Demetrias, where he wintered (as before is faid) he departed from thence, and sojourned a long time in T heff alonica. From thence after he was come to Amphipolis, he was furprifed with a grievous malady. Howbeit, certain it was and very apparant that he was more fick in mind than body; and that ever and anon the remembrance and object, the apparition and ghost of his son, whom he cansed N (innocent as he was) to be put to death, followed and haunted him so continually with care and grief, that he was out of all fleep, and could not lay his eyes together: yea, it drave him into raving, curfing, and execration of Perfeus his other fon; and so he ended his daies. But although Philip died iomewhat with the soonest for Autigonus, yet he would have gone very near to have flept into his thron, if either the Kings death had immediatly been divulged abroad or that Antigonus had then been about the Court that he might have had intelligence thereof. For Calligenes the Kings Physician, who had the cure of him, staid not untill the breath wasfully out of the Kings body; but so soon as he perceived that his state was desperat, upon the first deadly signs that he observed, fent messengers post to Perfens, who were set of purpose in places convenient, according as it was complorted between them twain: but he concealed the Kings death from all O them that were not of the houshold untill he was come. By which means Perfeus surprised them all before they looked for him, or knew abroad that the King was departed, and thus he took the Crown upon him by policy, which he had purchased with mischief.

The death of Philip fell out very well to give some delay and respit, and to gather more forces for the waging of war : for the nation of the Baltarna having been a long time follicited thereto, departed out of their own country, and with a great power as well of foot as horse, came on this

Now when the Conful was in deliberation with his councill, as touching war in Istria, some were of opinion, to proceed thereunto incontinently, before that the enemies could affemble their forces; others advised, to consult first with the Senat: but their counsel imported, who were for speedy expedition. So the Consul dislodged from Aquileia, and encamped near the Lake Timavus; which lieth hard by the fea. Thither came Caius Furius (one of the navall Duumvirs) with ten ships: for two such Dunmvirs or wardens had been chosen, to make head against the Ellyrian fleet: who with twenty ships in all, keeping the upper sea, were to guard the sea-coasts so, as they had Ancona (as it were) the middle center between : for L. Cornelius took the charge of all that lay on O the right hand thereof, as far as to Tarentum; and C. Furius of the left, unto Aquileia. These ten vessels (I say) were sent to the next port; against the marches of Istrat, with other ships of burden fraughted with store of victuals and provision. The Conful followed after with his legions, and pitched his camp five miles from the fea. And within a short time there was a good and frequent market kept in the port, from whence there was conveyed all manner of provision into the camp. At which fight, the fouldiers of the one guard as well as the other being affrighted, fled into the camp with a great tumult and alarm, and there caused far more fear than they brought with them: for neither were they able to tell why they fled thus as they did, nor give a ready answer to those that asked them the question. The skirmish and fight was more cruell, than for proportion of so few defendants; and not ended before that the Tribune himself and those about him, were slain every man; The Generall his pavilion and all about it, was overthrown: which E when the enemy had ranfacked and rifled of all that was there, they went as far as the treasurers lodging, themarket place and to the gate Quintona: where they found abundance of all things * By that gate fet out ready for their hands, and within the treasurers pavilion the tables pread and covered, was the market fet out ready for their hands, and within the treaturers paymon the tables pread and covered, leved, and it with good sates and meat upon them. Then their chief Lord & Leader (the vert) King afore a leading ted dictily to made no more ado but late Min down, fell to his victuals and made good chear; and anon all sit. theretefollowing his example, did to likewife, and never once thought of arms, or of enemies i, and like to those who wete not wont to fare so well and feed liberally, they greedily overchare ged their belier with wine and viands: but the Romans all the while flood in far other terms.

They trembled; they wear haftily to their business both on hand and sea. Down went the shipper. men and failess with their tites and booths; and look what provision of victuals or other things were fet fochso (ale aponthe ftrand and fhore, they harried and hurried a fhipboord : the foul, diers all affrighted ran amain to the fea-fide, for to be embarked. The mariners fearing left their veffels thould be overcharged lome pur back the preis and withflood them for coming in, o thers shove offirom the wharf, and lanched into the deep. Herenpon began a branl and broil, and from that they fell rogether by the ears, souldiers and marriners, one with another: Jome went away with knocks and wounds, and others left their lives behind them; untill at length by the Conful his commandment the fleet was retired far from the land. Which done, he began to foro the armed and unarmed apart. And hardly were there (of for great a multitude) twelve him dred found with armorabont them, and very few horsemen that had brought heir horses with them. All the rest were a confused and disordered company, resembling the raicall fort of camp G followers, as vactuallers, launders, feullions, and lackies: who had been a ready booty to have preyed upon in case the enemies could have thought upon any seats of arms. Then at last came a mellengento retall the third legion and to surprise the grand of the Gauls; and with that, from all parts they began to return again toward their own camp, for to recover it, and wife away and blot out the shamefull stain and dishonour which they had received. The Colonels of the third legioncommanded the fouldiers to throw down upon the ground their forrage and fewell, they charged the Centutions to fet the elder and uniweildy fouldiers two and two upon the hories and labouring beafts which they had discharged of their load ; and willed the horsemen to take up be. H labouring pears which usey man universely to make a what an house it would be to the third hind them every one a young infly footman; I freewing what an house it would be to the third legion for to regain by their valour the camp, which had been loft by the cowardice and tax of thole in the second; and early (by they) may it be supp again, if the Barbarians, while they are encumbed with the pillage might be jurprised at the waters, and be taken themselves, like as they overtook others before. This exhortation was received with great alactity and contentment of the fouldiers. Aloft were the entigns born and advanced apace, neither staid the post-entigns one whit for the fouldiers. Howbeit the Cof, and those companies which were brought from the fea. came first to the rampier. L. Atim a principall Censurion of the second legion, not only encouraged the fouldiers, but made remonstrance unto them, That if the Istrians these victories, had ever meant to guard and keep the camp with the same force of arms by which they had won it, they I would at the first have pursued the enemies to the sea, fo foon as they had turned them out of their tents; and afterwards have let a good corps de guard, at least wife before the campier and the avenues thereof: but like enough it is (faith he) that with guzling wine they were dead afleenlike beilts. And herewith he commanded A. Baculonius his own entign-bearer, a man o: approved valour and fingular prowefs, to advance his banner forward, Mary, that I shall (quoth he) full foon. if you will follow me alone that the thing may be done more quickly. With that he forced his whole frength and having flung the enfign over the trench into the camp, he was the first himfelf that entred at the campgate. On another part likewife T, and C, both Ælii, and Colonels of the third legion, were come with their Cavairy : then prefently followed those and whom they had horsed two by two upon the labouring jades and wagons of carriage, and after them the Col. K with his whole army. But of the Ithrians some few there were (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memory served them to runaway; the rest were dead affeep indeed and never awoke again, So the Romans recovered all their goods, lave only the wine and victuals which was devoured and confumed. The Roman fouldiers who were crazy and fick and had been left in the campafter they perceived their own fellows within the rampier found their hands again caught up, weapons, and made a great flaughter and execution. But above all others C. Populus, furnamed Sabellus, a Gentleman and Cavalier of Rome, bare himself most bravely that day. who being left in the camp (because he was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) slew the greatest number of the enemies, by far. Eight thousand Istrians fell upon the edge of the sword, and not one taken prisoner alive : for the choler and despiteous indignation of the souldiers was such, as they had no [mind at all of prizes and booties. How beit, the K, of the Istrians, drunk as he was had to good fortube as to be taken from the very board where he far, and halfily mounted on honeback by his men, and so fled a way and escaped. Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirty seven souldiers: and of them, more died in their morning flight than in the recovery of their camp. Now itchanced lo, that Cn, and L, both named Gavilii, new Coloners and inhabitants of Agaileia as they came with victuals, had like to have flumbled ignorantly upon the camp, when it was taken & possessed by the Istrians. They being retired back in great hate to Aquisiasleaving their carriage behind them, let all on a fright & uproar not only at Aquileia but alfo at Rome within few dates after: for thither was the rumour run, That not only the camp was forced by the enemies, and (which was true indeed) the Romans put to flight, but that all was loft, and the army utterly M defeated. Whereupon, as the manner was in all judden tumuits and alarms, writs went forth for musters and levies of fouldier extraordinarily, not in the City only but also throughout all Italy. Two legions of Roman Citizens were enrolled, and the Latine ailies were commanded to let out Toboo foor with 300 horse. M. Junius the Cof, had commandment to pass over into Gulia, and to levy of the Cities and States of that Province, as many as they were able to make and furnish. It was or dained withall that T. Chadius the Przetor thould make proclimation, that the fouldiers of the fourth legion, and of the Latine allies five thouland foot and swo hundred and fifty horfe, thould meet together at Pifa ; and that in the abience of the Col.he fhould efend that Province: allo that M. Triving the Prator should appoint the Rendermona at Ariminum; that the fift legion and the like number of allies, as well foot as horse, should there assemble. Then N Nero took his Journey, clad in his rich coar of arms, toward Pifa his Province. And Timina having to Arimmum Carni Caffins a Colonel, to take the conduct of the legion there, took multers at Roma, M. Junior the Col. passed out of Ligaria into Gaul and arrived at Aguiteia, having levied aid foundiers as he went, of all the Cities of Gaul and the Colonies, to be in readine sout of hand. There he was certified that the army was fafe and found: wherenpon he dispatched his letters to Rome to advertise them that they frould not trouble themselves any more in this falle alarm, and himfeit after he had dicharged the Gauls of those aids which he had imposed upon them, wene companion in government, Great was the joy at Asme, coming thus so it did unlooked for, The musters were had aside, the fouldiers discharged who were ensolled and had taken their military outh, and the army vifited with the plague at Ariminum was dismiffed and forthome. The & Intrans albeit they were en amped with a great drangth of armed men, not far from the Cof, his camp after they heard once that the Conful was come with a new army disbanded and fips every man away on all ides to their leveral Cities, and the Confuls reased with their legions to Again leia, thereto winter.

When these soubles of the were thus at length appealed these went forth anact of the Sense, That the Coff, thould agree between themfelves, whether of them swain wasso return to Rome

A for to hold the affembly for election of Magiffrate At what time as A Liennis Nerva, and C. Paprius Turdus, two Tribunes of the Commons, in all their Grations to the people; inveighed bitcerly against Mantins in his absence, and promulged a Law to this effect, That after the Ides of March (for the Coff, had their governments sheady prorogued for one whole year) he should continue no longer in place to the end that to foon as he was out of his office, he might prefently be called to his answer judicially. Quintus Elinijone of their Collegnes withflood this bill by them propoted, and after much debate and contention prevailed fo much, that it paffed not.

About the same time Tib, Son proning Gracehus, and L. Posthumius Albinus, being returned one of Spain to Rome, had audience given them by the Prator M. Titinius in the Temple of Bellong. there to discourse of the acts by them archieved, to demand their deserved honours, to the end B that praise and shankigiving also should be rendred to the immortall gods. Moreover, at the very same time intelligence was given by letters from T. Ebutius the Prator, which his son brought and shewed to the Senat, of great troubles in Sardinia: Namely, that the Ilians, joyning unto them the firength of the Balari, had invaded the province standing in peaceable terms: neither was he able to make head against them with so seeble an army as he had & the same wasted and consumed much with the pestilence. The same news related the Embassadors likewise of the Sardinians, making humble fuit to the Senat to relieve and inecour their Cities at least wife, for that their villages and country towns were already past help. This embassage, with all other matters concerning Sardinia, put over to the new Magilirats; as pitifull an embaffage allo was presented unto them from the Lycians, who complained grievously of the Rhodians, unto whom they had been annexed and made subjects by L. Cornelius Scipio: " Indeed (fay they) we nived sometime under the jeignory of " K. Antiochus, but that fervitude of ours under the K. compared to this prefent state and condi-"tion wherein we now are feemed unto us an excellent liberty: for not only are we now yoaked "and kept under publike authority in generall, by taxes, levies and impositions, but every one in es particular endureth meer bondage and flavery. Our selves are abused, yea, and our wives and "children luffer villanies before our eyes: upon our bodies, our backs and idesthey work upon "and discharge their humour of cruelty: in our good name (an indignity unsupportable) we are " distained depraved and defamed : yea openly in the face of the world they cease not to com-"mit outrages against us, even to nour and extend their authority over us, and to try masteries "upon us with extremity: to the end that we Ly, ians might be put of all doubt, that there is no D " difference between us and flaves bought and fold for filver in open marker. The Senat moved with these remonstrances by the Lycians, addressed their letters to the Rhodians to this effect, that it was no part of their meaning and intent, that the Lycions should be slaves to the Rhodians: or that any other born free, should be enthralled by any person: but their will was, that the Lycians should in such terms live under the government and protection of the Rhodians, that both States, the one as well as the other, might range and frame themselves like good affociats under the Dominion and Empire of Rome;

After this followed two triumphs over Spain, one immediatly upon another: first, Sempronius Gracchus over the Celtiberians: and the morrow after L. Polthumius Albinus over the Lufttanians and other Spaniards of those parts. Tib. Gracehus carried in shew 40000 pound weight of E filver: and Albinartwenty thousand Both of them divided among their fouldiers twenty five Demarif aperec, to each Centurion the same double, and trebble to every horseman. Thus did they altoby allies as well as by Romans.

It fortuned about that time, that M. Junius the Conful, came out of Istriato Rome, by occasion of the election which was to be holden and when the two Tribunes of the Commons, Papriw and Escience, had in the presence of the Senat baited and wearied him with interrogatories; as conthing the affairs passed in Iftria, they brought him forth also before the body of the people. Townshippedions after that the Conful had answered. How he had not been above 11 daies "in the Province: and as for the things that hapned in his ablence, he knew no otherwise than Schey did sonly by the common brait and report: then they went on origing him fill, and asking how it came to pass that A. Manline rather came not to Rome, to give account unto the State, "why he valled out of Gane, which was his afforted Province into Ifria? and to thew, when it, "I was throughter the Seine decreed; or the people of Rome granted by their voices to enterprise " that war? But haply it may be faid (qd. he) that albeit the war was undertaken only upon his own "head allow yer no doubt, executed it was right worthity with policy and valour, Nay, I wis, but "o forcommunity and mard it is to fay, whether it were begun more lewelly; that managed incom-" fidesing. I wo entire to pride out de were on a fooden at unawares surprized by the Iffirms: the Remen Camp was forced Straken, with all the firength of hotle and foot that was therein : the e sele frattered withour arms and the Col himfelf was the formost man that Fin away to the lear fideshio the fhips: and fittely he flood render an account of all these matress, when he is a Grennan person again, fince that he frould not do it being Cof. This florm past the general affectibly for the Magistrus election was holden: wherein were created Coll.C.Claudius Palcher, and Tib Somponius Gracebus. The next day following were the Prestors chosen to wit, P. Elins Tubero the second time, C. Quintius Flamininus, C. Numifius C. Mummius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Palerns Lavinns. The civil jurisdiction of the City fell to Tubero, the fortain to Quintius. The go-vertinent of Sielly was allotted to Namifing of Sardiniato Mummins. Howbeit, this Province by realon of the great war therein became the charge of the Cof. And bylot it fell to Gracehas: but Iffriato Claudius his Collegue. Gaut was divided into two Provinces; whereof Scipio by lot H obtained one, and Lavinus the other.

Lison the Ides of March, on which day Sempronius and Claudius entred their Confulfinmo. ved it was only in the Senat, as touching Sardinia and Istria, and the enemies to both those Prowinces, who there had levied war. But the morrow after, the Embaffadors of the Sardinians being referred over to the new Magistrats, and L. Minutius Thermus who had been Lientenant to the Conful Manlius in Istria, entred into the Senat-house, By them the Senat was informed how dangerous the wars were in those Provinces. Moved likewise were the Senators by the embasfies of the Latine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senat, after they had importuned the Cenfors and Confuls of the former year: the fum of their complaints was this, That their own Citizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and removed thither to dwell: which it it might be suffered, within few reviews and cessings it would come to pais, that their Cities should be dispeopled and desolat, their villages and fields desart and waste, and able to fet out no fouldiers for the wars. Semblably the Samnits and Pelignians complained, that four thouland housholds were gone from them, and retired to Fregella; and yet neither the one nation or the other, were let at a less proportion of souldiers in all their levies. Two captelous means and devices there were brought up, whereby men changed thus their Cities at pleasure. The Law granted this indulgence to the allies of the Latine nation, as many as left iffue of their race behind them in their house, That they should be reputed Citizens of Rome. By abusing this Law, some did in jury to their allies, other wronged the people of Rome: for, both they that were to leave such issue at home, gave their children, as it were, in villenage to some Roman Citizen K or other whom they liked of; with condition to manumife and make them free that they might be Fribes or enfranchifed Citizens. And they also who wanted iffue to leave behind them were held as Citizens of Rome. But in process of time without any of these colourable pretences of right, without regard of law and respect of issue, they crept in and had the benefit of the Burgessie and freedom of Rome, by their transmigration thither to inhabit, by enrolment in the reviews, To meet with these practiles, the embassadors craved a remedy for the time to come: as also that they would peremptority command all their allies to repair again to their own Cities: with an express inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vasfall and villain, and so to alienat him, with intention by that means to change the City wherein helived: and that whosoever became Citizens of Rome after that manner, should not becounted for a Citizen. These L petitions were granted by the Senat. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Isria and Sardinia which were in arms, to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thouland and two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thouland footmen, and 600 hortemen of the Latine allies; and ten quinquiremes or galleaces, with five banks of oars in case the Generall would warp them out of the atsenall. The like number as well of the Infantry as Cavalry, was affigned for Istria. The Confuls also were enjoyed to fend to M. Titinius in Spain one legion with three hundred horle, befides 5000 footmen of allies, and 250

Before that the Confuls cast lots for their Provinces certain prodigies were reported Namely, that in the territory of Crustimnium, there sell from heaven a stone in the lake of Mars: That in the territory of Rome, there was an infant born like a very stump, without head, seet, or hands: and a snake or serpent seen southernorm. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were smitten with thunderbolts and lightning. Allo at Puteuli two ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt. Whiles these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was seen a wolf allo in the day time at Rome, which having entred at the gate Collina, after much coursing and hunting, with much ado and noise of them that followed the chace, scaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquisine gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Cost, killed greaters beats for sacrifice: and for one whole day, a solemn supplication and prayers were made at all the sprines and alarss of thegods. These sacrifices done and pass, accordingly as it appears and the Cost sadd to the cost solemn supplication and prayers were made at all the Cost sadd to the strange tokens.

After this, C. Claudins published a Law by versue of an ordinance of the Senat, in favour of alliess and proclaimed, That those allies, and namely, of the Latine nation, who either themselves, or their ances from, had, been enrolled mong the Latine allies, during the Censorship of Marcus Chadins, and Trus Quintius, or any time afterwards, should make return every mainton his own City, before the first day of Nevember next ensuing. And Lucius Munuminethe Prator had incommission to enquire and search for those that returned not accordingly. To chais Law and Edich abovesaid of the Consiul, an actalio of the Senat was adjoyned, That the Dictator, Consul, Interregent, Censor, and Lord chief Justice in the Common Pleas for the time being, should endeavour, and take order, that who seven were manumised and made free. should take an oath. That he who manumised or enfranchied him, did it not with an intent, for so ex-othings the City wherein he was: and look who would not thus swear, him they thought not worthy to be manumised. But his charge and jurisdiction was afterwards committed to C. Claudins the Consul.

Whiles these affairs passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the year before, having wintered in Agnileia, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an army into the frontires of Jeria. Where, as they made waste and spoil far and near as they went, the

A Ifrians entred into a commotion and took arms, rather upon grief of heart and indignation to fee their goods thus pilled and ranfacked, than for any affured hope they had of their fufficience. to make head against two armies. Having therefore railed a concourse of their able youth from all their Cities and States, they affembled in hatte a fudden and tumultuary army, which at the first gave battell, and fought more in heat of courage, than with perfiftance of refolution. In conflict there were flain of them to the number of four thousand; the rest abandoned all war, and fled here and there into their Cities. From thence they tent embassadors first into the Roman camp to crave peace, and then the hostages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of thele news by the letters of the Pro-Confuls, C. Claudius the Conful fearing left this occurrence might put him by the government of his Province and the conduct of the army, without io-R lemn prayers and vows made, without his Lictors clad in their coats of arms, departed suddenly ingreat haste (all of the head) by night towards his Province, and made no man privy thereto. but only his Collegue. His voyage thither was not to rash and inconfiderat, but his carriage there was more foolish and undiscreet: for being thither come, he assembled a generall audience; where after he had very unleasonably reproached Manliss for his running away out of the camp. (to the great discontenument of the fouldiers, who were the first that fied;) and with opprobrious terms shaken up M. Junius also for taking part in this dishonour with his companion: in the end he commanded them both to avoid out of the Province. Whereupon the fouldiers made anfwer again and faid, That they would then obey the Confuls commandment, when (according to the ancient custome of their fore-fathers)he had made his solemn vows within the Capitolla C and then taken his leave and departed out of the City, accompanied with his Ufhers in their. rich coats of arms, warlike. Hereat he was so far enraged with anger, that he called upon the treafurers deputy belonging to Manlins, for chains and gyves, and menaced to fend Junius and Manliss both bound to Rome. But the deputy likewise made as little reckoning of the Consuls commandment: and the more animated he was to disobey the Conful, by reason that he was backed by the whole host round about him; who as they supported the cause of their Captains and Leaders, so they hated the Consul at the heatt. In concintion, the Consul being loaden and weatied with the contumelious and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the frumps and taunts of the multitude in generall (for they thuck not over and befides to mock him and make a taints of the multitude in general (for they stock not over and besides to mock him and make a laughing shock of him) he wen his waies again to Aqueleia, in the same ship wherein he came, a Prom thence he wrote unto his Collegne by an Edick, to charge those new fouldiers who were enrolled for Istrakto meet at Aqueleua: to the end that no business should keep him at Rome, but that with all speed he might depart from the City in his coat of arms, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vows accordingly, His companion in office was well content, and did all these things requisit full willingly: and a short day was affigned for the assembling of the souldiers at the Rendardona boven med. But Claudius was at Rome well-near as soon as his letters: where, at his first coming, he made an Oration in the publike audience of the people, as touching the demeanor of Marilius and Janius: and having staid no longer than, three daies at Rome, he for our with his Lictors formally in their coat-atmour, when he had made his vows solemnly in the Capitol, and so departed into his Province again with as much celerity and haste (into more) as he game from thence.

Some few daies before, Junius and Manlius began to affault by all forcible means the town Nefatium, into which the principall persons of the Inrians, and Epulo their King, were retired. Claudius, with his two new legions, presented himself before the town; and after he had discharged the old armies and their commanders; laid fiege unto it, and intended to force it with mantlets and engins of battery. The course also of the river which ran along beside the walls, and not only empeached the affailants but yielded water unto the besieged, he diverted into another new channell, and bestowed many daies work thereabout. This mightily affrighted the barbarous people to fee how they were cut off from water. Howbeit, they never thought of peace for al this; but fell in hand to kill their wives and children; and when they had so done (because they would F present to the view of their enemies, so horrible a fact and fearfull spectacle) they massacred them upon the walls openly in their fight, and then threw them headlong down. Whiles the filly women and poor infants (amidst their pitious and lamentable cries) were thus cruelly murdered the Roman fouldiers mounted over their walls and entred into the City. Their King when he once perceived by the fearfull outcries of those who fled) that the town was loft; for fear he should be taken alive stabbed himself with his dagger to the hearts. All the rest were either taken prifoners or killed. After this, two other towns, Muila and Faueria, were won by affault and raled. The pillage was greater than a man would have looked for in to poor a nation; which was bestowed every whit upon the fouldiers. Five thousand six hundred and two and thirty persons were fold out right in port fale under the guirland. The Captains of this war were first scourged with G rods and then beheaded. Thus Istria by the ruin of three towns and the death of their King, was appealed; and all the Cities and States thereof from every quarter, came in with their hoftages, made submission, and did fealty and homage to the Romans

The litrians war was no fooner ended but the Ligurians began to complot for to take arms and enter into rebellion, T.Claudius the Pro-Cot. (who the former year had been Practor) was governour and commander at that time of Pife with a garrifon of one legion. The Senat being advertifed thereof by his letters, thought good to lend the very fame letters to C.Claudius (for the other Conful was already passed over into Sardina;), and withall, a decree was granted outso this es. H fact. That confidering he had performed his commission in Isria, so as there remained no mote for him to do there, he should (if he thought so good) transport his army into Liguria, Mortover. monthe Conful his letters, wherein he wrote what exploits he had atchieved in Ifria, there was ordained a solemn procession for two daies together, Semblably, the other Contul Tib Sempronius, managed his affairs as happily in Sardinia: he entred with an army into the country of the Sardinian Ilians, Great aids were come from the Balarans to relieve and inccour those Ilians; with both these nations he fought a battell in pirched field. The enemies were discomfitted and mut to flight, turned out of their camp, and 12000 armed men flain. The morrow atter, the Col. commanded all their armor and weapons to be gathered together and laid on an heap; and this he burned as a facrifice to the honour of Valcan. Which done, he retired with his victorious at- 1 my into the affociat Cities, there to pass the winter.

C.Claudius likewise, upon receit of the letters of T.Claudius, and the commission directed from the Senat marched with his legions out of Istriainto Ligaria: where, the enemies werecome downinto the plains, and lay encamped near the river Scultenna. In which place there was a battell fought: 15000 of them were put to the fword, and not fo few as 700 taken priloners, either in the conflict, or within the Camp ; for that also was forced and won : besides, 51 ensigns they loft. The Ligurians, as many as escaped the execution, fled on all sides to the mountains for refuge and notwithstanding that the Consul spoiled and wasted their champain country, there was not one man made shew of arms. Thus Clandins having in one year vanquished and subdued two nations, and in one Confulship (a rare selicity in any other man) reduced other two Provinces into w quietness and peace returned to Rome.

Certain prodigious and monstrous fights were that year reported, to wit, in the territory of Crustumium, a certain foul called Sangualis, with her bill pierced into a facred stone. In Campain a Bref spake: at Syracusa a bull that straied out of the fields from the herd, lept the brazen cow there in the City, and did his kind. In the territory of Crustumium, there was a supplication and procession holden one day long in the very place of the foresaid prodigious sign, In Campain, the beef or cow aforefaid, was put out to be kept and fed at the charges of the City. Last of all the prodigy of Syracula, was expiat by a purgatory facrifice, by direction from the foothsaiers to what gods, inpplications & facrifice should be made. That year died M. Claudius Marcellus the Bishop, who had been Col, and Cenfor In his stead M. Marcedus his fon was consecrated Bishop, Like-1 wise in the same year, there was a Colony of 2000 Citizens of Rome planted at Luca. The Triumvirs or the Commissioners who had the conduct and placing of them, were P. Elius, L. Egilius, and Cn. Sicinius: one and fifty acres of land and an half was fet out for them apiece to occupy out of the territory late conquered from the Ligurians, and which had been sometime the possession of the Tuscans, before it was holden by the Ligurians.

Then came the Conful C. Clandius to the City of Rome, where after he had discoursed before the Senat, as touching the prosperous execution of his affairs, as well in Isria as Liguria, & thereupon demanded a triumph, he foon obtained that honour; and during his Magistracy triumphed at once over those two nations. In which solemnity of his triumph, he carried in shew 307000 Deniers, and * 85702 Victoriats, He gave to every common [Roman] fouldier fifteen Denarii 2- M peece, adouble proportion to the Centurions, and thrice as much to every horieman. But upon the allies he bestowed less by the one moity than to natural Citizens : and therefore as they followed his chariot, they were filent and faid never a word: a man that had feen them would have faid they were malecontent.

Story Stamped During the time of this triumph, the Ligurians perceiving that not only the Conful his army was brought home to Rome, but the legionalio at Pifadischarged by T. Claudius: thinking now all fear past and overblown, secretly levied a power; and having passed over the cross frontiers, by traverling the waies through the muontains, descended into the downs, and wasted the demains of Modena, and by sudden assault surprised the very Colony. The news hereof wasno sooner arrive ved at Rome, but the Senat commanded C. Claudius the Conful to hold the high Court for the for N lemn election, with all convenient speed: that so soon as new annual! Magistrates were created, he might return into his Province, and perforce recover this Colony out of their hands. So accoreing to the advice and ordinance of the Senat the faid affembly was holden; wherein were lected Confuls Co. Cornelius Scipio Hilpalus, and Q. Petilius Spurinus. Then were the Prators afterwardscholen, to wit, M. Popilius Lenas, P. Licinius Craffus, M. Cornelius Scipio, L. Papprius Mafo, M. Alburius, and L. Aquilius Gallus. The Conful C. Clandius had his Patent lealed again for one year longer, to continue in command of the army, and government of the Province Gallia. And for fear lest the list rians likewise should follow the example of the Ligurians, he had commission to lend those alies of the Latine nation, whom he had brought out of his Province for to tolemnize his triumph.

Upon that very day, on which the Confuls, Cneus Cornelius and Quintus Pesilius entered their Magnitracy, and facrificed each of them an oxe as the manner was, in the honour of Jupiter: In that beaft which Q Parilinecaused to be flain, the liver was found headless. When he had reported this accident unto the Senat, he was enjoyned to facrifice another beef, for to appeale the wrath of the gods. Moved then it was in the Senathouse as concerning the Provinces, and a decree paffed, that both Comiuls should be sent to Pifa, and against the Ligurians : but order was given,

A that whether of them had the charge of Pifa allotted unto him, he should (when the time came) repair to Rome against the election of yearly Magistrats. Moreover, there was another branch of this decree, that either of them should enroll two new legions, and three hundred horsemen and levy of the Latine allies ten thousand foot apiece, and fix hundred horse, And T. Claudius continued still in full command, untill such time as the Consul was arrived in his Province. Whiles these matters were thus debated and passed in the Councill House, Cn. Cornelius was called forth by a bailiff or Ufher. And within while after he was gone out of the Temple, he returned thither again with an heavy and dismaied countenance, and declared unto the LL, of the Senat, that the liver of that oxe which he also had killed for facrifice, a beast of fix years old and well liking, was confumed and come to nothing; and when he hardly beleeved the Minister attending upon the R facrifice, who told him hereof, that himself caused the water to be poured forth of the pot wherein the tripes and inwards were fodden, where he saw the rest of the tripes and entrales full and whole but all the liver wasted away, after a wonderful and miraculous manner, not to be spoken. The LL, were much terrified and amazed at this prodigious object; and the more perplexed were they, for that the other Conful likewife related unto them, how in regard that in his facrifice the liver wanted an head, he had killed three oxen more, one after another, and yet could not procure the favour and grace of the gods. Hereupon the Senat commanded him fill to facrifice these greater beafts, untill such time as he had his desire, and the gods were pleased again. Now it is faid, that all the other gods were well enough contented, and their ire mitigated and appealed, only the goddess * Salus, Petilius could not be reconciled unto, for all that ever he might do. Then * H. alth. C the Cost, and Prators committed the disposition of their Provinces to the arbitrement of the lots. Pifafell to Cornelius, and Liguria to Petilius. As for the Prators, L. P. pyrius Mafo was Lord chief Justice by lot appointed, within the City of all Citizens pleas, and M. Aburius had the jurisdiction over strangers: M. Cornelius Scipio M. Luginensis had the charge to govern the lower Spain, and L. Aquilius Gallus, Sicily, The two Prators behind, requested earnestly that they might not be fent into their Provinces, and namely, M. Popilius into Sardinia: alledging, that Gracehus was able to quiet that Island; and the rather, for that T. Ebutius the Prætor was by the Senat adiovned to him for affiftance: neither was it good to interrupt courses begun, the continuity whereof is the most effectuall means to exploit any great important affairs. For what with delivering up the sword by the old L. Deputy, and receiving it by the new successor (whom it were n more meet first to be trained up in knowledge of the State, than to be put to the managing of State-matters) of tentimes the good opportunities of atchieving brave enterprises pass by and are loft. This excuse of Popilius was held for good, and so approved. Then comes P. Licinius Craffus, and he for his part made allegations why he might not go into his Province: namely, by occasion of the solemn sacrifice, that he was to give his attendance upon. Now the higher part of Spain was allotted unto him. But commanded was he either to go into his Province, or else to take oath in a frequent and full affembly of the people, that the folemn facrifice (as he pretended) was the thing that hindered him, and nothing elie. This order being fet down and thus passed in the behalf of P. Licinius: then steps me up M. Cornelius, and required them to take an oath of him likewise, that he might not go into the nether Province of Spain. So both these Prators were E fivorn according to one and the same form of oath. Whereupon M. Titinius and T. Fonte us were commanded to remain in quality and place of Pro-Confuls within Spiin, and retain fill the same authority and power of command: and order was granted, that for to supply their forces, there should be sent unto them three thouland Citizens of Rome with two hundred horse, and also five thousand I atine allies, and three hundred horsemen,

The folemairy of the Latine holydaies began the * third day before the Nones of May: where- * 5.0f May. in, because at the sacrificing of one beast the Magistrate of Landvium in his prayer left out these words [Repuli Romani Quiritium] and prayed not for the good effate of the people of Rome, and the Quirits, it bred a scruple. The matter was moved in the Senat, and the Senat referred it over to the Colledge of the Bishops and Prelats of the Church, And they pronounced this award, That F foralmuch as those Latine seasts were not solemnized as they ought, they should begin again anew: and that the Citizens of Lannvium, by whose default they were thus to be renewed should be at the charges of all the beafts for facrifice. Moreover, to breed more fearfull scrupulosity in mens minds, it fortuned that Cneus Cornelius the Conful as he returned from that folemnity out of the Alban mountain fell down in a fit of Apoplexy: which turned into an Hemiplegia or dead palsie all the one fide of his body, and to he was conveyed to the bath and hot waters at Cumes: where by occasionthat his disease grew upon him still, he departed this life; from whence he was brought to Rome, and there carried forth in all magnificence of funerall oblequies, and right honourably interred. He had been Bishop also as well as Conful. Q. Petelius the other Confut, being commanded to hold an affembly for the jurrogation of a Collegue unto him, fo foon as possi-G bly he might be warranted by the anspices and approbation of the facted birds) and withall, to proclaim and publish the Latine feasts and holydaies aforesaid: summoned the election against houses: likewise at Gravifes the town wall and one of the gates were smith thunderbokes. It For the procuration whereof, the LL, of the Senat ordained that the Bishops should give order

Whiles the Confuls were thus flaid first both, by their form firminless holiness; then one of them by the death of the other; and afterwards by occasion of this new election and the rentes ing of the Latine festivall solemnity: C. Clandius in the mean time approached with his army to Modena, which the Ligurians the year before had won. He had not continued the fiege full three daies, but he forced the Colony: and having thus recovered infrom the enemies, he reflor red it again to the former inhabitants. Eight thouland Ligurians died there within the walls upon the tword : and immediatly he dispatched his letters to Rome, wherein he not only declared the timple news, but glorified him and made his boaft. That through his fortingde and fortune, I both the Romans had not an enemy that durft thew his head on this fide the Alpa ; and that he had conquered fo much land as might ferve for to be divided by the poil, among many thousands. Tib, Sempronius likewile at the same time, fought many fortunat battels in Sardinias and utterly tamed and subdued the Islanders: 15000 enemies he there flew: all the States of that nation which had revolted, were reduced to obedience under the people of Rome: the old tributaries had an imposition and exaction laid upon them of a double tribute, which they surely paid: the reft were put to a contribution of corn. After he had fet the Province in quietness, and received out of the whole Island two hundred and thirty hostages, he sent certain Lieutenants as messengers to make report at Rome of all his proceedings: who also in his behalf should make suit unto the Senat, That in regard of the happy success in those exploits under the charge, conduct, and fortune of Tib, Sempronius, fift, due honour, praise, and thankigiving might be rendred to the immortal gods; and then, that himself might be allowed at his departure out of the Province, to bring away his army with him. The Senat gave audience to the messengers above aid within the Temple of Apollo: and upon their relation ordained a generall procession for two daies: commanding the Coff. to facrifice 40 head of greater beafts: and withall, enjoying Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Conful to continue that year with his army in that Province. Then the election which had been published against the third day before the Nones of Sexulis for the substitution of one of the Coff.

was the same day accomplished. And Q. Petilius the Cos. created for his Collegue, M. Valevius Leto be employed in some Province or other; and fitly it fell out for his longing defire that letters I came importing how the Ligurians rebelled and were gone out again in arms. So after he once heard the contents of these letters, he made no longer stay, but upon the very * Nones of Santilis all goodly to be feen in his warriors coat of arms, he commanded the third legion (by occase) on of this alarm) to go into France, to C. Clandius the Pro Conful: also the Duumvirs or two wardens for the ports and navy to go to sea, and with a fleet to make fail for Pifa & from thence to coast about all Ligaria, and thus by hovering upon the seas, to terrifie the enemies that way alfo, Q. Petilius likewise the Cos, had appointed a day for his army to meet in the same place. Moreover, C.Claudius the Pro-Conful advertised of the Ligurians revolt, over and besides those for ces which he had about him at Parma, levied in hafte a strength of more fouldiers; and so with his complear army approached the borders of the Ligurians. The enemies upon the arrivall of C. M Claudian by whole conduct they well remembred how late they had been discomfited and put to flight near the river Scultenna, minding to feek for defence rather by the strength of advantagious places than force of arms, against that power of his which to their cost they had before tried, feized the two hils, * Letus and Baliffa, about which they raifed a mure also for their better safes ty. But such as lagged behind and quit the champain plaines and lower grounds with the latest, were surprised and cut short, to the number of fitteen hundred. The rest kept within the mount tains: who albeit they were in fear and danger of their own parts, yet folgot nor their inbred craelty; but ranupon the booties and prizes which they had taken at Modena, their poor priloners whom they held captive they pitionfly mangled, and killed most villanously: as for the beasts in the Temples every where they rather hacked hewed, and cut in peeces butcher like, than facrifi- N ced in decent, seemly, and religious manner. Thus being satisfied with the bloud and maffacre of living creatures, they took all their breathless things they had, and reared and stuck them upon the wals; and namely, implements of all forts, made rather for use and necessity than ornament and thew, Q. Perdine the Conful, for fear left the war would be ended in his absence, dispatched his letters to M.Claudius, to hasteaway with his army into France, for he would attend his coming upon the plains called Macri, Upon the receit of which letters, Claudius dislodged out of Liguria, and delivered unto the Conful his army at the faid plains called Maeri, Few daies after came Cains Valerius the other Conful thinher also. There they divided their forces, and before they departed one from the other, they both together made a survey and review of their severall atmies. This done, they caft lots into what quarters they should either of them go, for that they o held it not good policy to charge the enemy both of them joyntly in one part. Now certain it is, that Valerius received his lot according to the auspices, in that he was within the precinct of the Temple or prospect by the Augur assigned. But Perilius herein made default (asthe August pronounced afterwards) and namely theerror was herein, because he being himself without the compais aforefaid, had put the lot into the casket, which was carried afterwards within the cashet. cuit of the faid Temple, This done, they went into divers quarters: Pastins encamped affiont that

There, as he was entersing his fouldiers in open andience, he let fall (by report) an ominous word prefacing his own death never thinking of the ambiguihe let tall (by report,) an empression and the world this very day repercheton. Against them that had nilled and rangaked Pile and Lung O. 44. 17 book, Apennine were the Briniats. Against them that had pilled and rantacked Pilaand Luna, Q. Mutim made war within the compats of the River Andena: and when he had brought them in fubjection, he took from them their arms. For which exploits archieved in France and Liguria under the conduct and happy fortune of the two Confuls, the Senate ordained that there should be pu-E blick procession for three daies, and commanded to facrifice forty greater beasts. And thus verily the tumultuous wars of the French and the Ligurians, which arose in the beginning of the year, were in those time and without any great mattry dashed and appealed.

But now in lienthereof great care was taken for the Macedonian war by occasion that Perfeut fowed the feeds of debate and quarrel between the Dardanians and the Baffarnians. Besides, the Roman Embaffadors who were fent into Macadony, to fee in what terms things there flood, were now returned to Rome, and had brought word, That in Dardania they were up in arms. With them there came also from King Perseus certain Orators to make excuse in his behalf, and to cleer him in the action, namely, that the Baftarnians neither were by him fent for nor entred into any execution by his motive. The Senat would neither acquit the King as unguilty, nor yet directly accuse him as culpable in that point. Only they required that he should be advertised and admonished, to be very well advised and careful to keep that league and accord inviolable, which he would feem to entertain with the Romans.

The Dardanians feeing that the Baffarna were fo far off from departing out of their countrey (as they well hoped they would) that they endamaged and endangered them fill every day more than other, as bearing themselves bold upon the succours of the Thracians neer neighbours, and the Scordifei; thought it their best course in policy, to adventure upon some hardy enterprise, although it were ralh and inconsiderate: whereupon they assembled all in arms, and from every quarter of their countrey Thewed and advanced before the next Town, to the camp of the Bastagmans. Winter time it was, a leason of the year which they made choice of, that the Thracians and the Soordifei might be retired home into their own countries: which when they were advertised of and that there remained none but the Baffarna alone, they divided their forces in two parts: with the one, to march directly forward and openly to make head against them affront; with the other; to fetch a compais through by-waies and blind forrefts, and fo to charge upon their backs. But before they could wheel about the enemies camp, the battail was begun: wherein the Dardanians had the overthrow and were driven to put themselves within their City, which was almost twelve miles distant from the camp of the Bastarne. The conquerors followed the train of victory, Gggg

and incontinently invested the Town making fill account, that the next day either the enemies Ha would yeeld, or effethey should be able to win the place by mere force. In the mean time, the other regiment above aid of the Dardanians, which cast about, knowing nothing at all of their fellows deleat, began to affail the camp of the Baffarmans, left without a fufficient guard for defence, * As the manner of the Kings was he fate in a flately throne of Ivory to hear pleas and decide controversies of the smallest and most trifling matters. So transported was he and caried away with an humor of levity and spirit of inconstancy, so distracted & wandering in all the course of his life, that he was never feeled and well contented in any condition or state what foeter: in such fort, as neither he knew his own self, nor any man else wist well what to make of him. He would not feem to speak unto his friends, and hardly was feen to laugh-familiarly among those of his neerest acquaintance. He made a fool of himself; and mocked others likewile; such was his in- I ordinate and irregular munificence. To men of honorflanding highly upon their worth and reputation his manner was to beliew childifh trifles, as fugar-plums to eat or to play withal, toyes and gewgawes inflead of great and pretious prefents: others again that looked for nothing those he enriched. And therefore some deemed, that he knew not what he did: others gave it out that he did all in plain mockage, and therewere again that let not to fay, how he was out of his right wits, and clean besides himself. Yet in two things, which were both great and laudable, he carried with him a Princely and Royal mind indeed; to wit, in adoming Cities with stately gifts, and honouring the Gods with divine worship, He promised the Megapolitans in Arcada to raise a wall about their City; and in truth the better part of the money to defray the charges thereof, he fent unto them. He went in hand to build a magnificent Theatre of marble at Togas: at Cizicum, he R gave freely to the Prytaneum (a fair hall by it felf in the heart of the City, where at the common charges, certain had their diet offree coff) by way of honourable reward, a cupbord of golden plate sufficient for the surniture and service of one table, As for the Rhodians, I cannot say, what one special gift singular above the rest, he bestowed upon them; so liberally minded was he to them-ward, and his hand ever open to give them of all forts whattoever they needed or required, Now, his magnificence in honoring the Gods, what it was (if there were nothing elie) the Temple of Iupiter Olympius begun by him in Athens (10 answerable every way to the Majelly of that great God, that the like to it is not to be found again in the whole world) may tellify infliciently. Moreovet, he beautified Delos with goodly fea-enfigns, and with a great number of statuts and images, Likewise he promised to edity at Antiochia, a stately Temple in the honor of Inpiter Capi- E. tolinus; not only arched above-head with a golden embowed roof, but feeled all over the wall fides with plates of gold: befides many other things in divers places, which by reason that he reigned but a very short time, he could not finish and perform. In magnificence also of playes, publick shews, and pageants of every fort, he over-went all the Kings his progenitors before him, as well in regard of Grecian actors and gamesters, whereof he had many about him as of the rest who were acquainted with the fashions of his own countrey. He represented the fight of sword-players at the sharp with unrebated swords, after the custome of the Romans; with greater terror and fear at first, than pleasure and delight of men, who were not used to behold such fights; but afterwards by often exhibiting the same, in such manner, as sometime they drew blood one of another, yea, and otherwhiles gave not over 10, but fought to the uttermost, even to death, he made it a familiat M exercile & a pleasant speciacieto the eye; and thereby set an edge upon the courage of many yong gallants, and emboldned them to embrace chivalry and follow feats of arms. So as in process of time, he that was wont at the beginning to fend as far as Rome for these sensers, and to hire them for great wages and reward, now with his own * * * L. Cornelius Scipio (had the jurisdiction) over for rainers. To M. Attilius the Pretor, the government of Sardinia by lot was fallen, but he was enjoyned to pass over into Corfica with the new legion which the Confuls had enrolled, confilling of 5000 foot and 300 horse. And during the time that he should be employed there in, the wars, Cornelius had commission to continue in his charge and place of command, within Sardinia, Unto Cn. Servilius Capio for low Spain & P. Furius Philus for the higher, were affigned 3000 Roman footmen and an 150 horfe; but of Latine allies, 5000 of the one and 300 of the other, N As for L. Claudius, he was appointed to Sicily without any supply at all, Moreover, the Consuls had commandment to enrol two legions bendes, with the full number as well of foot as horse and to charge the [Latine] allies, with the fetting out and maintenance of a Y000 footmen & 600 horle. This levy and taking of musters, the Confuls went through with, in more difficulty, by reason of a great mortality, which beginning the year before with a murrein of kine & oxen, turned this year into pefillent epidemical diseases of men. Look who fell fick once, lightly they died before the seventh day: and those that overlived and escaped that erifis, lay long fire by it, and commonly of the quartan ague. The most that went of this malady were slaves, whose breathless carkasses lay ordinarily along every fireet unburied: and more than that, * men were not able to inter so much 4 Libiting non as the dead bodies of free perions they died to thick; in Inch fort, as they purified and rotted a- o bove ground : forneither hungry dog nor greedy gripe, would once touch them. And for certain it was known and noted, that neither all that year nor in the former, during the mortality of man and beast, there was not a vultur or gripe any where to be seen, Divers Prelats and Priests of State dropt away of this plague, and namely Cn. Servilius Capso a Bish op, the father of the Pretor: Tibe Sempronius Longus the ion of Titus one of the Decemvirs for facreed rices and divine service: P.

In the Veientian countrey a man child was born with two heads; and another at Sinueffa but with one hand. At Oximiana a maid child came into the world with teeth in the head; and over the Temple of Saturn (flanding in the market place of Rome) there was feen in the skie a bow full bent all the day lone, if the air were cleer and the weather fain and at one time there shone out three suns. Also in one night, there evidently appeared many flaming lights and fire drakes shooting along in the air. The men of Lanutum and Care affirmed plainly, That within their Town they faw a Serpent with a creft and mane, yea, and the fame marked all over with yellow spots like gold : and it was held for certain, that in the territory of Cana an oxe fpake. Now were the Embaffadors returned out of Affrick by the Nones of June, those I mean who went to Carthage, after they had been with King Maf miffs, and spoken with him. But better & more certain intelligence they had by this King, than from the Carthaginians themselves, as touching the affairs that had paffed in Carthage. Howbeit thus much they reported upon their affured knowledge, that Embassadors came from King Perfess, and had audience in the Senat secretly by inight within the Temple of A Coulspins. Also both the King affirmed flatly, and the Carthaginians themselves but faintly denied that Embassadors likewise had been sent from Carthage into Maca dony. Whereupon the Senatives of advice and refolved to dispatch their Embass, also into Macedony. And thete three were tehr to wit, O. Latim, M. Valerius Meffala, and Sext, Digitius 5. During this time, Perfetts by occasion that certain Doloprand obeied him not, and of some matents in controverly and difference referred the audience and decision to the Romans, and refused The arbitrement of the King ledforth an anny against them, and reduced the whole nation under his obedience and jurisdiction, From then che passed over the Octwan mountains, and upon cermain religious motions arising in his mind, he went up to Priphos for to visit the Oracle. Being thus on a finddain fees iff the Jery tieare and midt of Greece, he first ka terror not only into the cities

he had stated at Delphi nor above 3 daies, he returned into his own realm, by the way of Phihiotis; Achaid and The fall, without any dammage done or wrong offered to the territories through which he paffed Neither thought he it sufficient thus only to win the love and favor of those Cities & Hates through which he was to journey, but he addressed either Embassacors or wrote his letters, praying them to bear no longer in mind the enmitties which had been between them and he his farher for almuch as they were not fo bitter and deadly but they might well enough, yea, and ought to end and die wigh him as for him felithe faw no let or hindrance in the world to empeach them for entertaining a faithful amity with him. But above all others he fought means to be reconciled to the Achains, and to reenter into grace and favor with them. This nation alone of all Greese, together with the City of Athens, were grown into those terms of despight and malice against the Macedonians, that they debatred them from once fetting foot within their confines. And hereupon it came that when certain flaves fled out of Achan, they retired into Macedon; for refuge, and there remained: and because the Achauns had forbidden the Macedonians to come within their liberties they dust not likewise for their parts enter into the marches and frontiers of his Kingdom co recover their bondmen. Which when Perfour perceived he caused all those fugitive flaves to apprehended; and he dispatched his letters unto the Achaans, wherein he wrote, That he would right courteoully fend back their flaves home again, although they were run away from them unto him; adverting and advising them to beware and look well unto it, that there were no more any such escapes and sunnings away of their bond servants hereafter. When these letters were reed by Xonarchastheir Pretor, who fought to merry fome favor and to wind himfelt into grave with the Kingmoft of them that were prefent judged the letters to have been written right gracionly and with great government and moderation, but principally those persons, who beyond their hope were to recover and receive their flaves whom they had loft. or fear only our own shadows? If the league shale ontinue firm and sure between the Romans & 66 the Macedonians, then may we have entercourse of friendship, of commerce and weaffich with them, But for this present to think & confider hereof, in my simple judgment, is a niceand ticklish point, & besides, out of season untimely, and some what with the soonest. When he had thus faid, Arco brother to Xenarchus the Pretor discoursed in this manner following, "Callicrates (qd,he)hath caused both me and all of us besides, who are of contrary opinion to him for to find e'the more difficulty in speaking our minds to the cause in quetion. For whiles in maintenance of the affociation which we have with the Romans, he faith that it is diffurbed and troubled, (albeit there be no man about either to diffurb or trouble it) he hath wrought cunningly and N a contrived, that who foever feemeth to gainfay him may be thought to oppose and fet himself a egainst the Romans. If there will be war, Perfeus (ye may be fure) maketh no doubt but that we alto-E gether wilfollow the Romans: yet to long as the peace holdeth, furecase and suspend we in some fort our malice and hatred for the while if ended for ever it may not be. When the same men who had consented to the Kings letters before, gave their accord now all o to this propose, the chief and principal persons among them took great indignation and disdain that Perf us should feem to demand and obtain that by a few lines in writing; which he deemed was not worth the sending an embaffage. Whetenpon the time was deferred and no decree paffed at this Seffion, Afgerwards were Embaffadors addreffed untothem from the King at what time as a Diet was holy den'in Mogalepolie a but the fide which was for the Romans and feared to give them occasion of displeasine and offence, did what they could to debar them of access and entrance into the Compcel, And much about this time, by reason of these jars the Ecolians grew enraged among themfelves, and by dikharging their mutual fury in killing one another, had like to have brought the fare to a final ruin and defolation. But being weary thereof, they in the end as well of the one fide as the other, fent their Embaffadots to Rome, and also laboured at home to have the quafre taken up, and to be made friends and reconciled together. Howbeit this was croffed by a new mile hief that came between which also subbed the forther galls and freited the old tores. For whereas cetcain Hyparears, exiled persons, and being of the taction of Praxenus were promited liberty to return home again into their country, with lafe conduct also granted by Eupolemin one of the chief & principal men of the City : folit was, that fontione of them, men of mark and quality whom to meetuponthe way at they returned, Enpolemus himeli wenr out with the multitude Jafter they had been richtely received with conricous greetings, fallitations, and thaking of hards, had no Cooper carried within the gare of the City, but they were maffacted not withfranding they pleaded the faithme promise of protection and called the Gods to wirners, but all in vain. By this occasion the civil war bet ween them word much hotter than before and corned in the end to a light fire, Now diete arrived C. Valerins Lavinus, Ap Claudius Pulchers, C. Mimimim, M. Popilius and L. Canaprima as fent from the Senet of Rome, Before these commissioners the Embassadors from both factitons appeared at Delphi, and debated the marrer with great earneffnes and vehementy where Promanue located to have the better hand as well in hight of the cause as through his cloquent consucProcesses (1 say) who within few dates after, drank a cup of poisson of his wives tempering where M he died & she ondemned therefore, departed into exile. The like madnets haunced, the Candiots also & diffracted them with intestine differation. But upon the coming of $\mathbb{Q}_2$ Montius, the Licatenaire General, who was sent accompanied with a fleet, of ten sail, to appeale sheir debates, itsyleft to some terms of peace and attonement. There had been a true also before of its months but after wards the war samed out much more terrible. The Lycians likewife at the same time, were inselted & plagued with war by the Rhodians. But my meaning is not meither is it any part of my purpose, to describe the wars of forain nations, not to discourse of the circumstances how to proceeded for thought I have to do, & more than I can well discharge, to write the a & so play of the people of Rome.

The Celtiberians in Spain, who being tamed by force of arms, had submitted to I Gracehus remained quiet ali the time that M. Titinius the Pretor continued there in government, But imme-I diath upon the arrival of Ap. Claudius they revolted and began to shew themselves in openaction of rebellion, by giving a suddain assault upon the Roman camp. It was about the break of days when the tentinels upon the rampier and Corps de guard about the gates, might discover enemies coming a far off and to they gave the alarm. Ap. Claudins having put ont the fignal of battail & in few words exhorted his fouldiers to fight and play the men, led them forth at three gates at once. The Celtiberians made head and opposed their forces as they issued forth. At the first the skirmish was equal on both parts: for that by reason of the streights of the passage, all the Romans could not fight: but after that one had put forward another, and followed fail apace, they were all at length gotten without the trench, so as they were able now to diplay their battaillons & to confrom their enemies from one point of their battail to the other, wherewith before they were en- * vironed: and then they made to forcible a fally upon them, that the Celtiberians were not able to endure their violence. For before the fecond hour of the day, they were dift omfitted; and I spoo of them either died in the place, or yeelded their bodies prisoners: 32 military enfigns they loft and were turned out of the camp the same day; and here is an end of that war. For as many as escaped the conflict gat them home to their own towns & quietly afterwards bare the yoke of subjection.

That year were created Cenfors, Q. Fulvius Flaceus & A. Poßhumius Albimus: who made a review of Senators and chofe new, For Preident of the Senat they elected M. Emplius Lepidus the Archibiftop. Nine they put out of the Senat-houfe. The principal perfors noted and dispraced, were thefe. M. Corn. Maluginenfis, who two years before had been Pretor in Spains; L. Corn. Scipio, Pretor for the time being, and L. chief Juftice of the common pleas, as well among citizens as aliens; and L. Fulvius, who was wholebrother to the Cenfor himlelif, & as Y. Antiate reporterb, equal in degree of calling, and his fellow every way. The Confuls also after they had made their vows within the Capitol, went forth for their Provinces. The one of them, (to wit, M. . Emplius) had in charge given him by the Senat. to appeale the fedition of the Padoans in Venice, who as their Emballadors made report, by factious fiding and part-taking, were all on a fire with civil war.

The Embassadors who were gone into Essiss for to pacify the like troubles, brought word back, That it was not possible to bridle and refrain the furious rage of that nation. But the coming of the Consin made all whole among the Padoans and cured the malady: who having nothing else to do in the province, returned to Rome.

These Censors were the first that caused the streets of Rome to be paved with hard flint and M pebble from within the City and the high waies and causeys without to be raised with gravel.& the fides therof to be wel banked and kept in reparations: also bridges to be made indivers places: a scaffold besides for the Ædiles and Pretors to behold the games & p aies, Moreover the barriers in the race from whence the horses begin to run, and the Ovales to mark and score up the number of courses * . * Overand besides the goles beyond * . * the iron gates and cages * . * and at the feafts in the mount Albane for the Confuls. They took order besides all this for the paving with flint of the cliff or descent from the Capitol, and from the gallery or porch before the temple of Sourn looking toward the Capitol, unto the place called Senaculum, and the court Hoffilia ar bove it, Alio the merchants Hall or burie without the gate Tergemina they paved with flore, and fenced it about with strong stakes and posts of wood. The gallery also Emplia they cansed to be ! repaired; and made an accent by stairs from the Tiber to the burie or merchants Hall aforesaid-Without the same gate also, they paved with pebble stone the gallery or walking place into the Aventine * . * from the Temple of Venus. The same Censors hargained for the making of walls about Calatia and Oxymum: and having made tale of some publick edifices there, they employed the mony raised therof, in making of shops & stalls round about both the market places. The one of them, that is to fay, M. Fulvius, (for Pofthumius faid plainly, that unless it were by vergue either of an act of the Senat, or grant of the people of Rome, he would put forth no works to be made with dispense of their money) agreed upon a price for the building of a Temple to Impier at Fifangum & at Fund: also make a conduit, for water to be conveighed to Pollentia; and at Pilaurum for a way to be paved, and Sinueffa . . In these colonies, he caused also a fink or vault to be made about them to carry away all filthiness into the river also the market place to be enclosed with porches, galleries, and shops; and three stately halls called Iani, with quarrefours or four throughfares, and as many fronts. For these works, one of the Confuls disbursed the money, and bargained with the Publicans and undertakers. In which regard, the inhabitants of those colonies above-named gave him great thanks. These Censors were likewise severe and precise in exercising their office for the redreffing and reformation of mens maners: for many Gentlemen had their bories of fervice taken from them, which were allowed them by the City.

A little before the years end there was a folemn procedion holden one whole day for the happy archievement of the affairs in Spain, under the conduct and good forme of Appina Clauding the Proceeding and twenty head of great beatts were killed in facrifice. And the morrow after they went in another procedion with happlications, at the Temples of Ceres, Liber, and Libera: for that there was reported from the Sabines country, a mighty earthquake, which over-turned many thouses.

After that App. Claudius was returned out of Spain to Rome, the Senat ordained, that he should enter the City with the pomp of an Ovation. And now approached the time tor the election of new Consuls. Much ado there was and hard hold at this assembly, by reason of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Postbumius Albimus and M. Poptius Lana, were elected Consuls which done, the Pretors allowere created, to wit, Cn. Fabius Bureo, M. Matienus, C. Ciccreius M.

By which done, the Pretors allo were created, to wit, Cn. Fabius Butco, M. Matienus, C. Ciccreius IM.

This business and folemnity finished, Ap. Claudius Cento entring with Ovant pomp into the Ciry for his victory of the Celtiberians, brought into the common treasury 10000 pound weight of filver, and 5000 of gold. Cn. Cornelius was conjectated the Flamin of Inpiter.

The same year there was set up a painted Table in the Temple of the goddels Mauta with this inscription, bader the conduct and happy government of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Conful, the legion and any of the people of Rome, shokaed Satdinia. In which Province, there were sain and taken primare soon one mense. Ot those Pretors who were gone into their Provinces, M. Fabrus as he was in his johnney toward high Spain, died at Majilius by the way; and therefore upon intelligence given thereof by the Majilian Embajidators, the Sent ordained that P. Farrius and Cn. Servillius whom to fucced others were to be fent thould caft lots between themselves, whether of them should continue still in government, and have the charge of high Spain. And the lot fell out very well and fit, that the sidd Primrus who had ruled the faid province before, should there remain.

The same year, by occasion that a good part of the Ligurians and Gawls territory won by conquest lay soid and was not as yet in the tenure and occupation of any man there passed an Act of the Sense, that it should be divided by the pall. So, A. Antilius the L.chief justice of the City of Rome, by service of a decree granted out of the Sense, treated ten December sport commission commissions for D that purpose, to wit, M. About the lame time that these affairs possed at Rome there arrived thirher Embassadors out of Acidia about their ownsival discords and teditions. Likewise there came others from These dynamics what was a doing in Macedon. Much about the same time, the five Embassadors fent unto K. Perfessi for to fee into the affairs of Macedony, were commanded to take a voyage as far as Alexandria for to renew the old amity with King Prolomans, The names of them were thefe, O. Falerinis, On Entarinis Carco, Q. Babials Sulca, M. Cornelius Mammula, and M. Cacilius Denter. And eventhen of not much affet, there came Embaffadors from King Antiochus: and the chief and principal perion among them, one Apollonias was admitted to come into the Senat, where he excused the King his mafter for many good and just reasons in that he had not sent his tribute & made palment in soon as he ought by K theday appointed : but now (be faid) that he had brought it all, to the end that the King thould be to them beholden for nothing but the respite of time only. And besides, that they were come with a present of certain place of gold, weighing 300 pound. That the King his petition was, That the fociety and friendship which had been contracted between his father and them, might be renued also with him: promiting, that if the people of Rome would import any thing upon him to be done, which were meet to be laid upon a good andfaithful ally he would not fail in his devoir to perform all offices what loever. For why, the Senat had lo well deserved of him at what time as he fo journed in Rome, and such courtefy he found among the flour of the Roman your Gentlemen, that of all degrees and forts of men, he was reputed and used more like a King indeed than an hoftage for the time. These Embassadors received a gracious aniwer and withal A. Million L. the Pretor of the City was enjoyeed to renew the league with Animohia, which had been concluded with his father. As for the tribute, the treasurers of the City reterved it: and the Cenfors took all the golden veffels aforefaid; who had the charge to befow the same in what Temples they thought good. Unto the chief Emballador was fent a preferr in money, amounting to the fum of one 100000 Affet: who also was allowed as house to lodg in at his pleasure of free cost t and all his charges were defraied by the City, during the time that he made abode in half. The Embaffadors who had been in Sprid, gave this report of him, That he was a man in great favour and highly honoured with the King: and befides, fingulatly well aftered to the people of Rome. Now concerning the affairs of the provinces for that year, thus much as followeth, bear

C. Cicreius the Pretor fought in ranged battail with the enternies in Corfes, wherein 7000 of M the Handers were flain: and 1700 and better taken perioners. In the couffet the Pretor had vowed to build the Chappel of Juno Monda. After this, was peace granted to the Coffinn at their own fair and feeking but they were compelled two pay to hindred thousand weight of was Cicereins having thus jubdaed Corfica, paffed from thence over into Sardinia. A field alla was fought in Ligaria. Within the territory of the Statellats, neer the Town Croffie: for thither affembled a . great army of the Lightians. At first upon the arrival of M. Popilius the Conful they kept close within the walls bue afterwards feeing the Romans as the point to give affault and to lay battery to the walls, they issued forth of the gates and embattailed themselves. The Committor his part forflowed not to come to hand-fight, the only thing he fought for in threathing to give affeule. The conflict continued above 3 hours, and the hope of victory hung in equal ballence: N which when the Cot perceived, namely, how the Ligurian enfigurations and gave no ground; he commanded his Cavalry to mount on horieback, and to charge with all their force and violence upon their enemies in three leveral places! many of these horiemen plerced quite through the atiditof the battail, and paffed fo far, that they charged the enemies upon the back as theylought. Whereupon the Ligurians were much setrified and began to flie from all parts: very few retired back anto the City, by reason that the horsemen made head against them that avay month bendes, many of the Ligurians were left dead in the place; luch was their refoute persistance in fight: killed alfo they were every where as they fled." Ten thouland (by report) fell apponatic edge of the freezd, above feven hundred raken priloners in our place or other, and 82 military enfigns were ceried away. And yet was not this victory without effution of Roman o blood rior there died of them not fofew as three thouland (ouldiers, by reason that the formost of both fides fought to manfully in the forestont; and while they would not give ground one to the other, were firiken down and flain without mercy. After this battail, the Ligurians raillied themselves into one place, out of all parts where they were stattered in the routiand seeing that more of shelr men were lost than lest behield (for in all they were not above terriboufand) they yeelded famply without any composition? Howbeit in good hope they were that the

Control would not deal worle by them torin those rigorous manner than other Generals before him. But he disarmed themall, rased their Townstold their bodies & all that they had and sent let-Hers to the Senat of these exploits of his. Which when A Attitus the Pretor had read in the Senat for the other Confine I fill his insivas able to by occasion that he was employed in the furrey and vifiting of the Lands in Cabi planing the Brought it a very hard and cruel course, that the Statellats, who only of all the Ligurians had not born arms against the Romans, who were then affailed first, when as they began not of their own accord to make war, who also pur themselves into the protection of the Romans, should be thus rigorously intreated, thus torn, di membred and contimed in most cruel manner; that so many thousands of frank condition, innocent persons, and imploring the mercy of the Romans, Mohld be this fold out-right, (a most dangerous example, B that never hereafter any one will venture to submit himself again:) and finally, that they should he diffra ded and carried away into all parts, to live in flavery under them, who having been somerimes professed enemies of the Romans, now enjoy peace and repose. In regard hereof, there passed an areft or act of the Senar that M. Populius the Conful should pay back the price unto the buyers, and reffore the Ligurians to their former liberty; to take order also that their goods (asmuch as possibly might be recovered) should be rendred unso them also that armour should be made in that nation with all speed possible, and that the Consul so soon as he had reestablished the Lieurians (upon their submission) in their former estate should depart out of the Provinces for asmuch as the honour of victory confifted not in exercising cruelty upon the poor and afflicted but in vanquishing the obstinat. But the Consul as he bare himself proud and cruel against the Ligurians so C he she wed as great frowardness and disobedience to the Senar, And having sent away the legions to winter in Pifa, he returned to Rome, carrying a fell and angry fromack against the LL, and as fpightful and malicious a mind to the Pretor: where immediatly he affembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellana, and ratled up the Pretor in broad and gross terms. Forthat he, whose part it had been to have moved the Senat for thank (giving to the immortal Gods, in regard of the happy atchievement of the wars, in flead thereof passed an act of the Senat against him and in favor of the enemies, for to put him by his victory and to give it away from him to the Ligurians; and finally being no better than a Pretor, would have had the Conful yeelded in manner up into their hands. Whereupon he faid that he would be so bold as set a fine on his head: and with al, he required the LL, of the Senat to command and ordain, That the sreft devised against him might be p reversed; and to give order, that the processions which in his absence they ought to have decreed upon his letters sent of his good success) might now be holden; in consideration first of the honour due to the immortal Gods, and then respectively in some measure for his own desert. But after he was checked by some of the Senators to his face, and that in no milder tearms than he had been rebuked in his absence, he went his waies into his Province again, and obtained neither the one fuit nor the other. The other Conful Posthumius having spent the whole summer in surveying the Lands only, and never formuch as feen his own Province returned to Rome against the general assembly for election, and created Confuls C. Popilius Lunas. Confequently welle Pretors elected, to wit, C. Licinius Craffus, M. Iunius Panus, Sp. Lucretius, Sp! Cluvius, Cn. Sicinius, and C. Memmius, the fecond E time. In that year was holden a review of the City and the number taken of citizens, (when as Q. Fulvius Flaccus and L. Post humius Albinus were Centors:) wherein were found and enrolled of Roman citizens 26901 5. The number was somewhat the less by reason that L. Posthumius the Conful had proclaimed in a publick audience, That no person of those Latine allies, who were to return into their own Cities (by vertue of an edict made when C. Claudius was Conful) should be enrolled into the libbidy book at Rome, but every man in his feveral City. This Cenforthip was administred with concord-and unity, yea and to the good and profit of the common-weal. What Senators foever they deposed from their place and dignity, and so many Gentlemen of Rome as they took their Horsesfrom, they made them all no better than contributaries to pay all scot and lor, yea, and displaced them out of their tribes. And look whomsoever the one of them noted F. with diffrace and ignominy, he was not relieved nor allowed again by the other. This Fulvius

Corn, L'intului (a Decemvir for the holy rites and facrifices) that year died; in whole room was substituted A Post humius Albinus. There were such mighty drifts and clouds as it were of locusts, brought fuddainly at once by a wind from the Sea into Apulia; that with their swarms they overspread all the fields far and neer. For the riddance of which notione vermine consuming the fruits of the earth, Cn. Sicinias, Pretor elect, was fent with his full commission of command into Applia, who effembled a mighty number of people for to gather them up, and emploied much G time thereabout.

In the beginning of the year enfuing, wherein O. Popilius and D. Elius were Confuls, the remnant of the denates which arose the year before was seron food again. The LL of the Senat would have had the marter propoled & debated adamas touching the Ligurians, and the ordinance of the Senat in that behalf renewed But, as Alius the one Conful pur up a biltherof, so Popilius the other was an earnest sitter, & besought both his collegue & also the Senat in the behalf of his brother; nay, he proceeded to far, that he gave the house to understand, in cale they went about any such decree prejudicial unto him, he would cross and seroke the James by which counterance of his he H afrighted his colleague; but the LL, were offended to much the more and horned assume both the Confuls, yearand perfifted fill in their enterprise. And therefore when it was debated in countel as concerning the Provinces, albeit the Coff made means to be fent into Macedony the capte the war of Perfess was fo neer at hand) yet Liguria was affigued to both of them: for the Lil properted and faid, That they would not pass a decree for the government of Macchemonies the case of Pemilius were p opounded, and an act thereof entred Afterwards, when they demanded a wattant to enrol new armies, or at least-wife to levy a supply for making up the old, both the operacion and the otherwas denied. The Pretors also, who required to have a supplement with them into Spain, had a nay and namely, M. Junius into the hither province, and P. Lucretias into the larther As for C. Licinius Crassus, to him there fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City overcitizens, and r to Cu, Sicinius that other over forrainers. C. Memmius was allotted to Sigily, and Sp. Clavius to Sardinia. The Consuls for these causes being highly offended and angry with the Senat, caused the Latine feafts and holydaies to be published against the very first day that possibly they might, with an intimation that they would go straight into their province, and not attend the managing of any affairs touching the State, but only that which directly pertained to their government. Valerius Astias writeth, that in these Confulsyear, Attalus the brother of K. Exmenes came in embassage to Rome, to inform criminous matter against Perseus, and to give the particulars of the preparation that he made for war. But the Annals of many other writers (more worthy of credit than he) deliver unto us, that K. Exmenes presented himself in proper person : where he was received with such honor, as the people of Rome thought not only meet & agreeable for his deferts, K but also fit and surable to their own favours and benefits, which they had in ample manner conferred and in great number heaped upon him. And then he had audience given him in the Senate, where he shewed the cause of his coming to Rome what it was; namely, " (besides a terrent de-The Ocarion " fire that he had to see those gods and men by whose grace favour he enjoyed so good estate, as

"better he durst not wish) because he gladly would advertise the Senat by word of mouth, to " prevent and withfrand the deligns of Perfem. And beginning his speech with the platforms and " enterprises of Philip, he recounted withal, how it soft his ion Demetries his life, for that he food against the war with the Romans: moreover, how he had caused the whole nation of the "Bastarnians to quit their own countrey where they were born and bred, to the end that by their "aid he might pass over into Italy: but whiles (qd.he) these matters he projected and cast in his L " head his time was come, and arrested he was by death: but he left his Kingdom to him, whom " he knew to be the most spiteful enemy that the Romans had. And therefore Perfeus having re-" ceived this war (as a man would fay) by way of inheritance left him by his father even together with the crown and scepter, from the very first day of his raign, doth nought else but enter-"tain, softer, and promote the same by all the means and devices that possibly he can. Although in my conceit, and to far as I « could see into it, he made no more any preparation thereof, but was already upon action and execution. For he chaired Abrupolis, a confederar prince and friend of yours, forth of his Kingas dom. And Arterarus the Illyrian, another of your affociats and allies, he killed outright, bea caule he found that he had written some letters unto you. For the hazard of the field was common, and the iffue of war uncertain, Now all the Cities of Greece and Afia both, would rather their lives have known what the Em es haffadors of Perfeus, and what Eumenes had done in the Senat : for in regard of his coming mon of the states (supposing verily that he would stir coales and make some work) had lent their Embaffadors to Rome, precending colourably other matters in femblance, but indeed to liften after news; and among the reft, was the Embaffage of the Rhedians, and the chief thereof was one Satyrus, who made no question nor doubt, but that Eumenes had done their errand, and put their City and Perfeus together in all their criminall matters laid to his charge. And therefore he made all the means that possibly he could by the mediation of patrons; friends, and acquaintance, to debate the matter with King Eumenes before the body of the Senat : which when he had obtained, his tongue walked at large, and overbold he w s and too round with the King, in broad invectives and intemperat termes; namely, that he had follicited and ftirred up the nation of the Lycians against the Rhodians, and was an heavier friend unto Afiathen Antiochus had been, Which speech of his as it was plaufible enough and pleafing to the States of Afia (for they likewide by this time inclined to affect and favour Perfous) to it was unfavory altogether and odious to the Senat, and nothing profitable to themselves and their City. But contrariwite, this banding and conspirate against Eumenes, wan him the more grace and favor among the Romans ; to asthey did him all they honour they could, gave him most rich and costly presents, and endowed him with a curule it chair of estate, and a staffe or feepter, both of ivory.

After thele embassages had their disparch and were dismissed, Harpalus returned into Macedann in all speed and hast possible, relating unto the King, how he had left the Romans not preparing as yet for war ; but fo far out with him and to highly offended, that it appeared evidently it would not be long ere they began. And Perfeus again for his part, befides that he looked for no other. was well enough pleated therwith, prefuming upon the flour and firength of his forces, But above all other he maliced Eumenes molt: with whole bloud he laid the first foundation of the war : for he informed one Evander a Candiot and captain under him of certain auxiliary fouldiers, and three Macedonians besides (whole service and ministry he had used in the like feats) to murder the King. He gave them letters addressed to one Praco an hosteste of his, a jolly dame in I. Delphi, and of greatest credit and wealth among them. For affured he was, that Enteres minded to go up to Delphi, there to factifice unto Apollo. Thele traitors together with Evander let forward; and to execute this their defigned enterprise, they looked all about and fought for nothing but the opportunity of some place or other. Now, as men ascend from Girrba to the temple. before they come to any place much peopled and frequented with houses, there stood a mound or mud wal on the left hand of the path or way, rinfig tome what higher than the foundations and ground-work; along which wall there was passage for one by one and no more; for on the right hand the earth was broken down and fallen, and breach made of some a good depth, Behind that mound aforefaid, these traitors had hidden themselves, and raised some steps like stairs; to the end that from above, as from the top of a wal, they might discharge their shot upon K. Enmenes as he M passed by. Before him there marched from the fea, at the first a fort of his friends and followers. together with his guard intermingled one with another; but afterwards as the way grew more fireight and narrow, the train waxed thinner. But when they were one come to the place where they could not go but by one at once, Panialcon one of the States and princes of Etolia, with whom the King had begun some communication, entred first into the narrow path aforesaid . with that, the knaves that lay in wait behind, role up and rolled down two hige stones, wheref the one more the King upon the head, the other aftonished his shoulder. And verily all the rest of his friends and followers, teeing him fall with the blow, fled fome one way, fome another sonly Pania con Itaid behind all, fearleffe, to protect and guard the King. The murderous villaines might have fetched a short compals about the wall, and soon run to the King to make sure work and dif- N patch him quites but they supposing they had done the deed already, fied to the pitch of the mount Parnaffus, and made such halt, that when one of the companie hindred and staied their running, because he dragged behind and could not keep pace and follow them hard at heels through those freep and blind wates, they made no more ado but killed him out-right, for fear left if he were taken, he should be wray and disclose the whole treason. The body of the King lay slong on the ground; and first his friends came running about him, then his guard and houshold servants. When they reared him up, they found him afterned with the stroke and altogether senseles in a trance. howbeit, by fome heat remaining, and the heating of his heart, they perceived there was fome life, but little or no hope they had that he could escape and live. Some there were of his guard and pensioners about him that made pursuit after these murderers by their tracks and when they had O held on their chale as fat as unto the creft of Parnaffus, wearying themselves to no purpose. they gave over and returned as wife as they went. The Macedoniaus as they had begun an audacious enterprise incenfiderately, so they left it undone as tearfully and without advice. Now by this time was the King come again to himself. And the morrow after, his friends conveigned him to his ship: from thence to Corine b: & from Corine b along the streights I showe they brought their velsels, & crossed over to Egina : where his cure was carried to close & fecret, without admitting

About the same time C. V elerites Was returned out of Greece, who had been sont thither as Embaffador to look into the flate of the countrey ato mark also and oblerve the plots and proceedings B of Perfens. He reported all things sutable and agreeable to the intelligences given by King Enne. nes, and withall, brought with him from Delphi dame Proxe, in whole fiouse those villanous traintors were lodged and harboured : also one L. Ramnins a Brandusian, who informed moreover and gave evidence as followeth. This Ramnins was one of the principall citizens of Brandafans: and used to lodg and entertain in his house, not only of the Roman captains, when they came to town, but also the Embassadors of forcein nations, such as were of greatest mark, and principally those that were sent from any Kings. By this meanes, acquainted he grew with Perfess, albein they never had teen one anothers face. And being invited by the King his letters, wherein he was promited great hope of fome neer and inward friendship above others, and confequently of great preferments thereby, he made a journey unto him. Within a short time he was wound into yery familiar acquaintaince with the King, and drawn into privat conference and diffcourse of fectors. C farther, I wis, then himfelf was willing or liked of. For the King dealt with him, yea, and importuned him with inkant prairie and large behelts of rich rewards, that for almuch as the Roman captains and Embaffadors uied to take his house for their Inne, he would cause as many of them as he write for, to be poisoned. Now for that he knew it was a right difficult and dangerous matter to come by fach a poilon and compaffe this project, especially if many were party and privy to him , and befides, the eventuncertain, either in the effect of the drug it felf to be ftrong; quick and foreible enough to do the feat : or in the feeret working thereof, left it (hould be found and fried ; he would therefore put into his hands fuch a porton, as neither in the giving nor after it was given, might be known by any fign whatfoever. Rammins fearing left if he refuted & denied, he should be the first man to make affay and make experiment of the poison, promited so D to do, & then departed, But return to Brundufinm be would not before he had spoken with C. Fan lerius the Embaffador, who then fojourned (as he beard lay) about Chaleit. First unto bim he revealed this plot, and by his commandment came along with him to Rome: where being brought into the Senat, after audience given, he laid abroad in every point all that had paffed. This new matter, over and besides those which Enments had reported, was the cause that Perfens was the fooner taken, for an enemy, and to declared the rather because they faw him not only about to make open war war of a princely and royall mind, but also to practife and execute priwilv all kind of milehief, by way of covert brigandage, theevifh ftealth, and fecret poifon . The managing of this war was 'put off and referred to the new Confuls : howbeit for the prefent ordain ned it was, that Co. Cocinius the Pretor who had the juriffiction between citizens and frangers. E should levy and enroll souldiers who being conducted to Brundusium should with all convenient faced commit to fes, and fail over to Apollonis in Epirus, for to leizupon the maritime Cities : to the end that the Conful unto whom the Province of Macedonia should be allotted, might arrive there with his veffels in tafety, and fet his forces on land with eafe.

Equapor, after he had been kept a long while at Egina, during the time of his hard and dangerous erre, so soon as ever he might go safely abroad, went-to Pergians; where, over and besides the old harted field in his breast, being prieked sile with this fresh and bleeding villany practiced by Person, he prepared war with all his power to the utterment; and shinter repaired; unto him Embassions from Remer to teltific their joy for his evasion and cleape out of so neer and great a danger.

When the Macedonian war was delaied and put off for one year, and the reft of the Pretors gone already into their provinces, M. Jamus and Sp. Lucretius (unto whom be fell the government of Spales) after that they had importuned and we ried the Senat, in using to long for one thing, obtained at the length a commission for a fupply of fouldiers to make up the army; by vertue whereof they enrolled 3000 foot, and 130 horse for the legions 1, and evied 3000 foot and three hundred horse for the army of the alices. These forces were transported into Spain with the new Pretors.

The fame year, after that a great part of the Campain tetritory, which privat perions here and there held in occupation withour regard of hawful title & tenure, was upon diligent furvey made by Poffsmins the Conful! recovered again for the public the of the City of Rome; M. Lucrot sime a Tribune of the Coga, preferred a law, that the Cenfors should let out to farm the Campain lands to tenants for yeefly reat. A thing that had not been done for many years after the winning of Capma, namely, that particular men should be so greedy as to encroach thus beyond their bounds appose the common walt.

there came to Rosse Embaliadors from Arientes, beinging with them the Kings fon, a very H. thild. The speech they made was to this purpose, that the Kings their malier had been his form to Reissis, thereto have his education a to the emotion here to trought up, might freed the infantises of the secondary of the heir fall library of the property of the breinty, entertainment and protection was, that they would repetifying pro him not only the breinty, entertainment and protection that privat persons, afford to their guelts but also to take the their or the Senat & pleased them highly. Whereupon they ordined they are the first of the senation house with all the furniture, wherein the yord prince and his train might keep their refusince.

The Threcian Embaliadors likewise prefenced themselves before the Senat to debate their own controverties in their hearing. and withall defined their friending and any in the Senation of the Senation controverties in their hearing, and withall defired their friendthip and amiry. They obtained their fuit, and befides there was fent unto them by was of prefent, the fum of 2000 Affes a peece ? Ghd were the LL of the Senat that thele States were received into their lociety, by reason Thracia lyeth hard on the back fide of Macedony; but to the end that they might have perfect intelligence and notice how all things went in Afa and the Ilands, they fent thither C. Clanding Noro, and M. Decimins in embaffage : whom they commanded also to wift Creet and Rhodes; and withall, both to renew the amity, and also spie and observe whether the hearts of those allies had been follicited and tempted by K. Perfeut. As the City was thus in doubtfull suspence and expectation of the event of this new war he-

Am lius the Conful, who had for his companion in government Serg. Fulviur) wasby a clap of thunder and lightning rent and cloven from the very base to the chapter. This was taken for a produgious token, and report thereof was made to the Senat. The LL gave order, that the Arutpices should be conferred with about it, and their advice taken : likewise they commanded the Decemvirs to look into their books of Sibyla. The Decemvirs for their part declared, that the City thould be purged and hallowed, publick (upplications and prairies made to the gods; and greater beatts killed for iactifice, as well at Rome in the Capitoli, as in Campain neer the promontory of Minerva. Also that with all convenient speed, there should be places solemnly exhibited for ten daies together, in the honour of most gracious Japiter. All this was done with diligence accordingly : but the Atu peces aforelaid, made answer out of their learning, that this prodigy I. portended good and fignified the advancement of their own territories - together with the deliruction of their enemies; for that those beak heads which the form overthrew, had been the spoils of fhips won from the enemies. There trapned other occurrents belides to encreale the frupulous religion & devotion of men: for reported it was, how at Saturnia within the town it rainedblood three daies together. Item, at Calatia an affe was foled with three feet; and a bull together with five kine were frucken ftark dead with one thunderbolt and flash of lighting : last of allast Oximum there was a showr of very carth and nothing else In regard of these wonders also, see in the

were celebrated, supplications made, and one day kept holiday and all shop-windows shat. Yet were not the Confuls departed into their provinces, because they neither would obey and condescend unto the Senat in proposing the matter as touching Populish at the connect table; and M the LL, were as resolut for their parts to let no decree paile, before that were done. The fpight and heart-burning they have against M. Popilius, grew the more by occasion of his own letters, wherein he wrote and gave them to understand, that being Proconclude had now's second time fought with the Statellats in Ligaria, and put ten thouland of them: o the fword, by reason of which hard courses and extreamities of war, the other nations likewife of the Ligurians were entred into arms. At which news not only Popilins was blamed behind his back of making war against all law and equity upon them that had yeelded, and thereby provoking those who before were quiet to go out and pur themselves in action of rebellion ; but the Confins allo were checked to their races in the Senat, because they fet not forward to their charge and government. M. Matters Serme and Quintins Marins Serlla, two Tribunes of the Commons, feeing the LL, of the Senat thus N drawing all in a line, took heart unto them, and both menaced the Confuls to fine their, unless they made more half unto their province ; and also recited in the Senat a law which they had drawn and framed, and were upon the point to promulge, as touching the forfaid ligurises who had fabmitted. The tenor whereof rin in this form, That what perfor four of Statella had peoled Bimfelf and was not restored to Liberty and freedom before the calends of " Sextilis neme ensuing, a i of August. the Senat upon : best oath [hould ordain one frecial commifficate to make in que fitton by whose fraud, coven, and nosice he was in villenage and punish the party accordingly. A question in the Senat, Whom they would have fix upon their inquisition according to the form of the faid law. And the LL ordained himfelt so be the inquificer, Thenat length and not store the Confuls put themlelves in their way toward their province, and received the charge of the arms from M. Popilini. This Popiline duft not yet return to Rome, for fear he flooid bescalled in cuefilon and put to his answer before that Presos and inpreme judg; who had required the advice of the Senat as touching that enquest framed and drawn of purpole against him t knowing full well how the Senar was not well affected to him, and the people much more maliciorfly bent and fer against film. But the Tribunes of the Commons thought they would prevent and meet with this flinching of his and absenting blenself, by intimation of another act and law provided in that her half namely, that if he entered not into the City of Rome before the * Ides of Newtonber jumes B diath following, it should be lawfull for C. Livinus to proceed in judgment, and give sentence 13. of November 1 against him in his absence. This cord towed and haled him to Rome with a witnesse; and when he was returned and entred into the Senat, they were upon his top, and gave him fuch a welcome thither, asteftified their displeature and hard conceit of him. After he had been well baited and had not been enemies, after the time that Q. Fulvins and L. Marlins were Confuls, those the Pretors, C. Licinius and Cn. Sicinius, should reftore and establish in their formerstate of freedomic and that the Conful C. Popilises thould fet them out lands to occupy and poffeffe beyond the Po. By vertue of this arrelt, many a 100 were let free and enfranchiled, who being transported over the river Po, had land affigned unto them accordingly. Now M. Popilins upon the law Martia (promulged by the two Marris, Tribunes of the Com.) answered for bimielf judicially twice before C. C. Licinius. At the third time, the Pretor overcome with a respective grace and favour to the Cof. a blent, and the earnest praiers of the whole name and house of the Popelis, adjourned the dee fendant to make appearance into the court upon the * Ides of March on which day the new magiltrats were of enter into their offices: and this he did, because himself by that time should be 15. of Mars's a privat person again & therfore not to fit upon the bench as judg to hear pleas and to determine. Thus the aforefaid act as touching the Ligurians, finely finited and cunningly avoided, came for At that time the Carthaginian Embaffadors were at Rome, with Galuffa the fon of Malaniffa; between whom hard hold and much debating there was in the Senat. The Carthaginians complained, that over and besides the lands (about which there had been fent commissioners from D Rome before time, to view the place and to enquire into the cause) Majanifis within the last two yeers and by force and arms poffeffed himfelf of more then threefcore and cen towns and callies.

Ibaken up among them, an act of Senat was entred in this wife, that to many of the Ligurians as

should war within their own confines, if they dissiezed the Numidians of thole peeces, yet feared they that one express article of the accord, where they were debarred in plain terms to wage against the associats of the people of Rome. Howbeit, the Carthaginians could no longer endure this pride? cruelty, and avaries. Sent therefore they were unto the Senar as humble orators that it might E please them to grant one of these three requests : to wir, That either they might debate with lad different audience before them (being allies to both alike) astouching the right of the one and the other : or that they would permit the Carthaginians to datend themselves by just and la whith arms, against unjust and ungodly force for elle finally (it partial favour swayed more with them then the truth of the canle I to let down at once what their pleature was should be given away out of their own, to Mafariffa. For they yet, would have tome gage of their hand, and know. what they gave ; whereas he himfelf had no ftayiner would ever fee to make an and ; fo unfatishle was his luft and appetite. But in cate they might obtain none of these points, and that there could be found any fault or trespais of theirs, committed fince the peace granted unto them by School then, that they rather then any other would chaftifethem. For rather they had to live in ferrie tude under the figenory of Romans with fafety, then enjoy such a liberty as should be exposed to the injuries of Mafanifa. And better it were for them to perifh and die once tor all, then to live and languish under the yoke of a most cruell and bloudy batcher. At which words the tears trickled down their cheeks, and down they fell at their feet. Lying thus profitate upon the the ground, as they moved pity and compalsion to themselves, to they procured despight and may lice against the King. Then thought good it was to demand of Guluffa; what he had to an fiver as conching these matters ? or else (if he had to rather himles) to declare before, for what cause and upon what occasion he was come to Rome. Gulassa made answer, share acither it was ea-

for that he had continued to conflant in his fealty and allegeance to the people of Reme. The Se- H nat theshaving heard what they could say of both fides, las in councell as touching the demands of the C rehaginians : and at length commanded this answer to be returned, how their advice and pleasure was, that Galaffa should presently depart and go into Numidia, and give his father to miderstandfrom them, that with all speed he send his Embassadors to the Senat, as concerning those complaints which the Carthaginians had made of hims also to give intimation and knowledg unto the Carchagimans, that they repair like wife thither to debate their controversies & differences between them. And if it lay in their power to effect ought for the bonor of Majariffa, they would be as willing to do it hereafter, as they had been ready heretofore. Mary, to minister justice for favour and affection, that they would not do it in any wife. Willing they were that every man thould know and hold his own, and keep him within compatte; neither minded they to fet out; new limits, but to observe the old bounds. Indeed they had granted to the Carthaginians, after they were conquered, both towns to inhabit, and territories to posselle; not to this end, that in time of peace they should plack that away by wrong and outrage, which during the wars they could not take from them by martial law and force of arms. Thus was the yong prince, together with the Carthaginians, difmiffed. Prelents were given both to the one and the other according to the order. and other courtefies of holpit-lity were friendly observed

Much about the same time Cn. Servilius Capio, App. Claudius Cento, and T. Annius Luscus. Embassadors sent into Macedony, for to demand amends and restitution, and withall to disclaim and renounce the Kings amity, returned to Rome. Who having related in order what they had fren and heard, enflamed the Senat more against Perfens, who were alreay of themselves enkind. led enough. They made report, "That throughall the cities of Macedony they faw prep ration "for war in all forcible manner; that when they came to the court, for many daies they could "find no means of accesse to the speech of the King; and in the end, after they were departed "from thence homeward (as being part all hope of parley with him) then and not afore, they were "called back again out of their way, and so brought unto his presence : that the sum of their em-" baffage and speech unto him was this, namely, to put him in mind of the league first contracted " with Philip, & afterwards renued with himfelf fince the death of his father; wherein by express "words he was inhibited to bear arms without his own frontiers, and likwife debared to levy st war upon any confederat allies of the people of Rome : after this, that they had recounted and " laid abroad from point to point those specialties, which they themselves had lately heard King 1. " Emmenos to declare and discourse, which were all apparent trusts, upon his own affured know-"ledg. Moreover, that the King held a secret councel for many daies together, with the Embas-" fages of the Cities of Affa: in regard of which injuries, that the Senat thought it reason and e-"quity that he should make satisfaction, yea, and restore back both to them and also to their f affociats, what foever he held contrary to right, contained in the accord. That the King here-upon at the first fell into a fit of choler and indignation, and gave them hard terms, reproaching st at every other word the Romans for their covetonineis and infolency. And as for their Embaffadors that came unto him one after another, he said they were but spies, to liften and see what he "did or faid; & no marvel, for they thought it meet that he should conform and frame himself in "all his words and deeds, according to their beck and commandment. At the last, when he had in 4 this wife discharged his choler with high words & broad speeches for a long time, that he com-" manded them to repair again unto him the next morrow, for that he would give them their "answer in writing and then he delivered unto them a script to this effect as followeth. First, as "touching the accord & covenant concluded with my father, that is nothing to me at al. If I inffer-"ed it to be renued, it was not for any liking or approbation therof, but because I being new come " to the crown, and lately poffessed of the Kingdome, I was to bear and endure all things what-"loever. But in cale they will enter into a new league with me, requilit it is that a treaty and a-" greement paffe first of the conditions. And if they could be content that a covenant were drawn 4. with equall and indifferent capitalations, set I will fleep upon it and be well advised what to do "for the belt, as I doubt not but they likewise will have a good regard to the profit of the Com- N I mon-weal. And herewith, that he inddainly flung away from them, and we all began to avoid "out of the pallace. Whereupon we proceeded according to our commission to abandon and "disavow his amity and fociety. At which word of ours, he Italed in great wrath and fury, and "with a loud and thrill voice, warned us upon our own perill and hazard, to be gone out of the "marches of his realm within three daies : finally, in this maner we departed and put our felves "in our journey, and found neither friendly welcome at our first coming, nor any courteous en-"tertainment while we were there, nor yet a kind farewell at our departure. When they had once done, the Theffalian and Ætolian Embaffadors had audience.

The Senat, to the end that they might know out of hand, what captains and commanders the commonweal was to employ, thought good to write annothe Coff, that the one of other of them (who first might) should repair to Rous for the creation of new megistrats. And no great matre? to ipeak of, as concerning the flate, was that year done by the Colf. But more expedient it was shought for the commonwest, to suppress and appeals the Ligurians, whose blood was up and shafed against them, considering that the Macedonian war was in 4419 expectance. Morcover, the Embalisders of Ha gave occasion, that Gentine allo King of Ispricate was had in jealousie : who at one time both complained of him, that now swice he had walled to

A their country and also made report, how the Macedonian and Higgs were all operand to great together, that with ones confent and common comfetthey prepared to war upon the Ro mans : finally that the Illyrians were now at Rome in thew and femblance of smbaffage, but indeed and very truth,no better then fpier,addreffedon purpole by the mostve and advice of Peifer to hearken and learn, whereabout they went at Rome. These Illyrians were sene for into the Sener houle, and when they had faid, that they were emploied in embassage from King Genting, to answer unto those acculations which it might be the lifeans framed against him , it was againstemanded of them, How it hapned that they went not directly nor the wed themselves in such fort to the magistrat, that according to the maner and custome, they might have had their lodging prowided and prefents given them, with the ordinary allowance of the City, meet for them during B their abode, that thereby knowledg might have been taken as well of their coming, as also of their businesse and errand? But being taken tripping and failing in their answersthey were commanded to void out of the Councel chamber. For thought it was not meer, to give them their difparch as Embaffadors, fince they made no means to prefent themselves unto the Senat : but rather they were of advice, to dispatch Embassadors of their own to the King, to fignific unto him, which of his affociats had complained unto the Senat, how he had burnt their villages within their territoties: yes, and to tell you it plainly, that it was not well done of him, that he could not forbest but do wrong to his own allies. In this embassie were fent, A. Terentins Varro, C. Pletorins, and

Likewise those Embassadors, whose commission was vilit the affociat Kings, returned out of A-

Ga, and reported that in the faid Affa they had communication with Eumenes; in Syria with An-fies of Perfem, howbeit they perfifted firm and falt in their professed fealty, and promised to per-

C sinchus, and in Alexandria with Ptolomens: who all of them had been follierted by fundry embaf-

form what loever the people of Rome would command them. Also that they went to the confederat flates, whom they found true and loiall enough, excepting the Rhodians only, whom they perceived to be floring & wavering, as altogether infected & poisoned with the counsel of Persons. Now were the Rhodian Embaffadors come to answer those things which they knew were commonly bruited aboad touching their City : howbeit the Senst was not of mind to give them andience, before the new Confuls entred into their office. But they were all of advice to delay no longer the preparation for war. C. Licinius the Pretor had in charge, out of the old Quinqueremes which were laid up in the docks and harbors, to repair as many as might ferve at fea; to D rig also and prepare a fleet of 30 fail. But if he could not come to make up that full number, then to write unto his colleague C. Memmius in Sivily, for to repair, calk and trim those thips which were in Sieily, that with all speed possible they might be sent to Branda Faire. The faid Pretor C. Licinins was commanded to enroll of Roman citizens (and thole, Libertins, such as of bondmen born, had been enfanchiled) for mariners and failers, as m.ny as might ferve 25 thips: and Ca. Licivius had commission to levy as many of Latine allies for the like number of thips; also the Pretor was enjoined to charge the Latime allies with 8000 foot, and 400 Horfe. A. Attiline Serranus, who had been Pretor the yeer before, was cholen to receive thefe forces at Branda fie um, and to conduct them over into Macedon; and Ca. Sicionas the Pretor was appointed to have the army in readiness for to be transported. As for C. Lieinius the Pretor, he by authority E from the Senat, wrote to C. Popilius the Confel that he should command the second legion, which had been longest emploied in Ligaria, and constitted of the most experienced fouldiers, together with four thousand footmen and two hundred horse of the Latine allies, to be ready at Brands finm upon the * Ides of February. With this fleet of ships and forces of fouldiers, Ca. Siemins 13 of Neuertr was commanded to keep Macedomy, untill one were appointed to succeed him ; and for this parpose his charge of command was continued for a yeer longer. All these directions of the Senge were put in execution with great diligence and expedition. Eight and forty Quinquerems were fet affore out of their docks : and L. Percins Licinius was ordained to conduct them to Bundufium ! the other 12 were fent out of Sicily. Three Embaffadors were dispatched into Apulia and Calabria, to Wit, Sex Digitins, T. Inventins, and M. Cacilins, for to buy corn to ferve the fleet and the army. Now when all things were provided and in readiness, C. Siemen the Pretor departed from the City in his watlike coat of arms, and arrived at Brundushum. About the end of the year C Populiar the Conful returned to Rome, fornewhat latter then the Senat had ordained; who was commanded to take the first time, and withall speed to creat new magistrate, considering that so great a war approached to neer. And therefore when the Confull discourfed in the temple of Bellong as touching his exploits in Liguria, the LL, of the Senat were nothing well pleased to hear him? but in Read thereof, they muttered every where, and asked him oftentimes, Why he had not reflored to liberty those Ligarians, who were oppressed through the wicked proceedings of his father? The election of the Confuls was holden upon the twelfth day before the Calends of March G according to the writs that went out: wherein were created Confuls, Pab Liemins Gracebas and Cains Coffins Longings. The morrow following, the Pretors were elected, to wit, Cains Sulpining Galba, L. Parini Philar, L. Canillas Diver, C. Lucrerias Gallus, C. Canining Rebusins and LViline Annalis. To these Pretors the provinces were affigued in this manner s that two of them (hould fit as LL chief justices in Read for civil juildiction: three other to have the government of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinta: to as the fixt only friend remain not allotted to any place. for to be emploied whereforee the Sense would think good and precine The Confuls elect were commanded by the Sense, upon the folerandsy when they ware to enter into their magic it threy, after they had facrificed greaten beats, as it appearaised any it full forth, that the gods would vouchate the war which the people of the man intended now to enterpring to Theel well and come to happy file. The fame day the Sense decreed, that C, forth in the Colling from a feet our plains for ten daises together in the bonor of Ing. Ope. Mag., and the offerings highligher made at all the forines and alters, it to be commonweal continued for ten yeers in the fame wood effate as now it flood. And as the Senat ordained, the Conful wowed into the Capitoli, that the faid plaies should be exhibited, & offrings were presented of as great value as it pleased them to fee down. This yow was pronounced by the Contal in the prefence of no fewer then 140 Sense ters and according to that form of words which Lepides the high-prieft or loveraign Bifhon indited. That yeer died certain Prelats of State, to wit, L. Amplion Pappus one of the Decement virsor superindents over the holy rices, and Q. Fulring Flacens a Bishop, who the yeer before had b.en Cenfor. This man had a il and he fortuned that news came unto him of his two fons, who then Served in the wars of Illgricum, how the one was departed out of this life, and the other law fick of a grievous and dangerous malady. The forrow for the one, and the fear for the other, happing to just at one time, brake his heart and oppressed his spirits; intomuch as the next morning, when his fervants entred betimes in to his bed-chamber, they found him banged by a cord. and strangled. It was thought abroad, that he had never been his own man, fince he was Centor. and commonly it was spoken, that Juno Lacinia in wrathfull displeasure against him for spoiling ber temple, bereit him of his right wits. In the room of Emilius, M. Valerius Maffala was Substituted Decemvir : and in Stead of Fulvius there was elected Archaishop, Cheus Domitius K Engharbur, who to lay the truth was very yong to be made a prieff. In the year wherein P. Licanus and C. Cafiins were Confuls, not only the City of Rome, and the whole land of lealy, but all the Princes and States of Europe & Alia, were amused respectively upon the war between the Macedonians and Romans. Enmenes (King of Asia) nor only carried an old cankred malice against Philip, but also was pricked forward with new despite and anger upon a fresh occasion, in that by the wicked practise of Perfens, he had like to have been facriffe ced at Delphi. Prusias King of Birbynia, was resolved not to enter into arms, but attend the ifsue of the war. For he thought it not reason and seemly for him to take arms in the defence of the Romans against his wives brother; and this account was made, that if Perfens hapned to have the better, he might foon obtain pardon at his bands by the mediation of his fifter, Ariarates King L of the Cappadocians, over and belides that he had promited aid to the Romans in his own name, ever fince that he bad linked in affinity to Eumenes, drew the lame way which he went, and joyned with him in all his counsels both of wer and peace. As for Antiochus [King of Syria his teeth watered verily at the Kingdome of Egypt, as he, who despited as well the childhood of the yong King in his nonage, as the weaknesse and negligence of his guardians: and confidering there was some controversic about the title of Caleforia, he supposed that he should have good occasion to levy war, to manage also and exploit the same without empeachment, whiles the Romans were bulled in the Macedonian war; howbeit as well by his own Embalfadors fent into the Senat, as also unto theirs addressed unto him, he promised stoutly to be for them. Prolome. wil the yong King of Alegor being yet ander age, was at the disposition of others : his tutors and M protectors, as they prepared to wage war against Antiochus for the recovery of Calofyria, fo they promifed the Romans withall to do their devoir in the Macedonian war. Maffaniffa [King of the Numidians I was altogether for the Romans ; he furnished them with com, and intended to fend his fon Mafagenes with sids both of men and elephants in that fervice. Howbeit he fo dilpoled of his deligns, as might ferve his turn which way loever the world went for if the victory fell to the Romans, he ordered that his affairs should remain still in the same flace; and better he was not to look for, because the Romans would not luffer any violence to be offered unto the Carthaginians; but in case the Romans went down and had the overthrow (who then protected the Carthaginians) then he made full reckoning of Afato be his own. Gentini [King of Illyria cum I had lo demeaned himfelf, that he was inspected of the Romans ; yet was hence fully resol- N wed which fide to take unto and it feemed he would joyn to one or the other, more upon a fit as ittook him in the head, than with any discretion or advice. Corps the Thracian, King of the O. drylians, took part evidently with the M cedonians. In thele terms (I fay) flood the KK. as touching this prefent war. As for the free Cities and Seates befides, the common people every where (as al wates lightly it is feen)enclined to the worle part, and rate with the K.& the Macedonians: but the principal persons and men of quality, a man might perceive affected diversly. Some went with the Romans all upon the head, infomuch as they greatly empaired their authority in excessive favour to them : few of them were induced by the just and upright government of the Romans, but the most part were carried away with the strong conceit, that the more they emploied themselves for them, the greater men they should be at home in their own Cities. Another Q fort there were of the Kings flattering favorits, who being deeply drenched in debt, and desprit of bettering their fortune (if the present flate held fall) abandoned and gave themselves over to entertain all changes and innovations. And somethere were besides, possessed with a vain humor of their own, because Perfeus icemed to have more favour of the common people. Athird fort there were (and those of the best and wifest of all other) who if it had liven in their hands to deA they would have to be greated lord, within the modern made the Romans rather then the K. Mary if they might have had their liverty, so be shafers finished of their foreste, by their good will they would not have had the one part advanced by modern their containing their foresten, by their good will but the forest and pullateness shafe both remaining material and subvisions of the other; but that the forest and is between short both shockate of the Cities should continue in the belt takes when as the one part night overproved the weaker fide from the injuries of the: mighties. And this fet that five defends the first that the deposit of the containing the state of the cities of the mighties. And the behaviour and deposit head to those has were the partalers and favourers of either side.

The Contain that day wherein they entered their government, when the lacetificed deposition does not be supported to the contain were the partalers and favourers of either side.

The Confish that day wherein they enterdebing overce the purtakers and favourars of either fide.

The Confish that day wherein they enterdebing overcoment, when they favoificed according to the ordinance of the Schat) with genare bealth in all the temples and chappelly wherein for B molt pair of the year like facted beds and coubles for the gods were prepared; and thereby had prefaged by good tokens, that their paires were acceptable to the immortall gods, made report unto the Senat, That their facultices were as they ought to be, as allo their paires, which they conceived as too their general theorem. The Bowell-priers like wife by their learning declared, that if they wentabout any new enterprise, they should make speed; for why? alloid prognolicate visitory, triumph, and enlargement of their feigners. Whereupon the Lighthe Senat commanded the Consults to propose to the people the first day of the general assembly of the Centures in this maner: In the name of God, and to the welfare and happiness of the Commonwealth induced as Perfection of Philip K. of Maccolony, against the accord and sevenant excluded with his father fifth and after his dath sevened with him hath lexited was upon the allies of the speak of Rome, waste their territories, seized their Cities, complotetals center into arms against the people of Rome, waste you that was be enterprised and waged against him. This bill passed by all the intrages of the people.

C that ind but previded larmer, fouldiers and a fleet: multiplic to make fattifallin, steafeth it you that war be enterprised and waged against him. This bill patied by all the intrigues of the people. Then was there an act of the Senatlikewise entered, that the Confuls should either agree together, or edge call tous for the provinces of least and Microdony: and look whose lot fell to Maccedony, he should be nevel entrolled, for either Conful twain: with that seed and faction, which took is part, unless they made amends to the people of Rome. It was concluded also, that four legions should be nevel entrolled, for either Conful twain: with this preheminence and advantage to the province of Macedony, that whereas to the legions of the other Conful (according to the ancient custome) there went but five thousand foot and two hundred shorse speece, there should be enrolled for Macedony fix thousand foot and two hundred shorse equally to a less possible of the confusion of the Considering to the amount of the considering the same of the considering the same of the considering to the other confusion of the other confusions, and the sundred horse equally to a less besides those fix hundred horse make the confusion of the other confusions, he hould of those allies transport over into Macedony, fixteen thousand footmen and eight hundred hories. As for Italy, twelve thousand footmen of allies and fix hundred horse were thought infficient. Moreover this prerogative had the Province of Macedon; that for Centurions and fouldiers the Conful might enroll of the elder loft whom he thought good as many as were not above fifty yeers of age . In chooling of Tribunes military and colonels, the old maner was this yeer changed, in regard of the Macedonian war, to wit, that the Confus (by advice and authority of the Senat) (hould move unto the people, that the faid Tribunes might not that year be elected by voices of the people, but that their elections should be referred to the njudgment and discretion of the Confuls and Pretors. The charge of command was thus divided among the Pretors as followeth. That Pretor whose let fell to go whither it pleased the Sense to send, was assigned to take his journey to the fleet at Brundufinm, and there to furvey and revise the lea-lervitors, and look how muny he thought not meet for fervice, them to discharge, & to make up the number with chosen Libertines; and in any wife to order it fo, shartwo third parts conflitted of Roman naturall citizens, and the other third of allies. Item, That provision of victuals for the navy and the army. frould be brought out of Sicil, and Sardinia. And the Pretors of those two provinces had in charge to exact a double tenth of the Sicilians and Sardinians, and this grain to be conveighed into Macedony for the army. Now Sicily fell to C. Canning Rebulm, Sardiniato L. Furins Philate.

and Spain to E. Camblems. G. Subjetum Galba was L. chief tultuse for the curves of Rome, and L. Jamus Ambalia for the firstingers our C. Lucress Gallas his lot was to gowhere the Senat would employ him. Between the two Confuls there was fome just and wrangling, rather then any great debate about their province. Captus for his pate faid, That he was by the right to war in Macedony without any citting of lots for the matter, for simuch as his colleague might not enter into lot with him, and fave his oath. For he being Pretor, had twom folemnly in a frequent afferholy of the people foceasite he would thitt off and not go into his province, it that he had octain to selectrize figrifices in a certain place and apon for dates, which could not be performed (as they juggle) if he were actes. And the famely a loss is leasanch be well done during his abtence now that he is Cosful no more then whiles he was Pretor. Howhels if the Senat be of opinion and long, that more confidention is to be had location of the confidential regard of the out he josok before in the Pretorfilm, yearwill now in the Confulmin, their regard of the out he josok before in the Pretorfilm, yearwill now with the fooding confined and the pleasure of the Sanas. All Inde pares cen. this was debated in the Tribunes-court. Thither was M. When he had thus faid, the Confuls highly commended him, and from before the people brought him into the Senat. And there also by the advice and authority of thit honor rable house, thanked he was, and the Marshal-Colonels, in regard of his vertue, appointed him to be the principall Centurion of the Pilani in the first legion. So the relt of the Centurions renouncing their appeal to the Tribunes, yeelded obedience in the muster and levy above said.

To the end that the Magistrars and great commanders might go more timely into their governments, the Latine feasts and holydaies were published to be holden upon the Calends of June's C Which foldermity being sinished. C. Latertisis the Petert took his journey to Brundassum, having fent before all necessary furniture and provision for the sleet. Besides, those armies which the Consul's levied, a commission was directed out to C. Sulpinius Galat the Pretore, to enroll sour legions of Roman citizens, with the ordinary full proportion of intantery and cavalry, and to chuic out of the body of the Senat four Colonels to command them. Also to levy Latin allies 15000 foot, and 1200 horse, and to take order that his army should be ready togo whithersoever the Senat chaught good. P. Licinius the Col. at his own instant request (that over and above the armies of citizens and allies, he might have an addition of auxiliaties) obtained of Ligurians 2000 of Candiot archers an uncertain number, namely, as many as the Candiots upon request would fend Moreigness and allies, he might have an addition of auxiliaties propose. Pelbinnius Albinnis, Q. Terentius Calleo and C. Abusius were sent in embassage to Masaissand the Carthaginianns. Semblably it was thought good to send three Eimbassadors into Grees, to wit, A. Passamia Albinnis, Q. Decimius, and A. Licinius Nerva.

At the very fame time therelatived Embassadors from King Perfeus. But suffered they were not to enter into the City; confidering that both the Senat had ordained, and the people affented ald ready to make war upon their King and the Macedonians. So, admitted they were into the Temple of Bellona before the Senat, where they delivered their mestage in this manner : That King Perfens marvelled why there were armies transported over into Macedony? And if the Senat might be intreated to much, as to recall them home, the King would make fatisfaction for the wrongs done unto their allies, in such sort as the Senat in their discretion would appoint. Now there was in the Senat-house at that time Sp. Carvilius, fent back for that very purpose out of Greece from Cn. Sicinius. He made report and remonstrance, how Perrhabia was forced by arms, and certain Cities of Theffely won: with other exploits that King Perfens had either performed, or elle was in band to enterprise. To which challenges the Embassadors were commanded to make answer. But after they were seen once to falter in their speech, saying they h d no farther commission then that they had delivered already; they were willed to relate unto the King their mafter th t P. Lieinia so the Confal would shortly be in Macedony with an army, unto whom the King might address his Embassadors, if he minded to do as he faid and to make amends. As for tending any more to Rame, there was no need nor cause, for almuch as they would not suffer any of them to pals through Italy. When they were dismissed with this short dispatch, P. Licinius the Consul had in charge, to F command them to go out of Italy within 11 daies, and to fend Sparing Carvelins for to guard them all the way to the lea-fide untill they were shipped. These occurrents passed in Rome before the Confuls were gone into their provinces.

Now by this time Cn. Sicinius (who cre that he left his magiftracy, was fent before as far as to Brandafium to the fleet and the army) having put over into Epirus 50c0 foot and 300 horfe, was encamped before Nymphenum in the territory of the Apollomets. From thence he tent certain colonels with 2000 fouldiers, to feez theforts and califies of the Daisarctians and illyrians, by occasion that they of their own accord made meanes and lent for garrillons, to the end they mighe bebetter guarded &fecured from the violence and invation of the Macedonians bordering upon their confines.

Some few daies after, Q. Martins, A. Attilius, P. and Ser. both Cornelli and Lentali, together with L. Decimins, who all had been fent in embatsic into Greece, brought them to Coreyra one thousand footners; where they both parted between themselves their feveral quarters whither they would go, and also their fouldiers. Decimins was fent to General King of the Myrians, with commandment, it he saw him any waits coming on and enclined to entertain analy, with the Romans, to found him and give the alsay, yes, and to draw him into the also ciation of this wise.

The two Lentels were fent into Cophalenia, from thence to traverie and croffe other into Pale in pennefus, and before winter to feeth about and compatie the coast of the Welt-fee Mering A Attions were afsigned to vifit Epirais, Erolis and Theffalis. From thence they were enjoyeed to have an eye into Buotia and Engas, and to to fail into Peloponne fut where they appointed to meet with the Lentuli. But before that they departed from Core, ra, letters were brought from Paylen. wherin he demanded what reason the Romans had either to transport any forces into Green dere feiz upon the Cities? thought good it was to return him no answer by writting, but only by wind of mouth thus much to fay unto the meffenger that brought the letters, That the Romans did it for the defence and fafeguard of the faid towns. The Loniuli as they rode their circuit vifiting the Cities and towns of Poloponnofas, exhorting the States and commonakties thereof ind ferently one as well as another. To sid the Romans at this, prefers against Perfeur, with fembiable coarses and like fidelty as they had flood with them first in the war against Philip, and afterwards in that with Antiochas; might here in their publick assemblies much muttering and grundling thereas. The Achaens (who from the very beginning of the Macedonian war had been eltogether for the Romans, and during the war against Philip, enemies to the Macedonians) took it in didain that they were reputed in the same ranke with the Messeni ns and Eleans, and no better then they who had born arms against the people of Rome, for Antrochus their enemierand who but the other day. being enrolled into the commonality and countell of the Achaens, complained that they were delivered unto the victorious Achaens, as the recompence and guerdon of their conquest, Mar-Lus and Attilius as they went up to Gitana a town of Epirus, ten miles from the fea, in a general Councel holden there of al the Epiross, had audience with great contentment of them als Four hun- K dred of their yong and able lufty men they fent into the Oriftians countrey to lie in garrifon for defence of those Macedonians who by them were fet at liberty. From thence, they held on their progreis into Atolia : and after they had lo jorned there tome few daies (whiles a new Pretor was elected in the room of him that was deceated, and Licifens appointed the governor, a man known for certain to favour the Romans) they paised over into Theffaly. Thither repaired the Embassadors of the Acarmanians and the banished persons of Atolia. The Acarmanians were enjoyned to utter and declare before them what they had committed and done against the people of Rome, being inveigled and deceived by the promites of the two Kings Philip and Antiochar during the wars against the one and the other; fince occasion was now presented unto them, for to make amends and falve all that was smile. For if upon their ill demerits towards the people y of Rome, they had made trill and tafted of their elemency, they might now by good detent prove their boundy another while. As for the Bostians, they were reproved and upbraided for entring into association with Perfens: and when they seemed to lay the whole fault upon Ismenias a captain of one of the two factions, and certain Cities and States which being of a different opinion

were drawn to the fide; Say ye fo ? (quoth Martins again) and that shall foon appear, for we all permit every commonalty and City to answer spart and severally for themselves the best shey can-Now was the Diet of the Theis lians holden at Lariffa : where, as the Theis lians took good occasion and found ample matter of thankigiving the Romans, for the liberty which by their goodness they had obtained: to as the Roman legats had as copions an argument to render them thanks, for that first in the war with Philip, and afterwards of Antischar, they had been so mightily aided by the Thefsalian nation. Thus by this mutuall rehearfall of pleasures and good turns M given and taken, the hearts of the multitude were enkindled with a fervent zeal to decree and ordain whatfoever it pleafed the Romans to defire. After this councell was diffolved, there came Embaisadors from K. Perfeus unto Martins, upon a speciali assistance of the privat friendship and hospitality which had passed between his father King Philip, and the said Marsins Land his father.] These Embassadors began the speech with a commemoration of the said familiar and inward acquaintance, requesting bin: to permit the K, for to have access unto him, and to commun. together. Martins answered, that he also had heard his father speak of the aminy and mutuall holpitality between him and K. Philip: in regard and remembrance of which neer bond of familisty be was the more willing to take upon him the charge of that embassage and commission. As to the parly, he would not have deferred it at all, if he might commodicately have wrought it : & N now for this present he promised (to soon as he possibly could) to send his commers before to advertife the King, that they might come to the river Penens, whereas the paisage lieth from Omolium over to Dium. And verily at that time, Perfins was retired from Dium into the inland quarters of his realm, and had gathered some prety gate of hope, in that Marsens had given sit, how for love of him he had undertaken this embassie. After some few daies they repaired to the place appointed. This King accompanied with a great train as well of his friends, as his courtiers and penfioners which guarded his person. The legats likewife were attended spon with no leffe a troop, by reason as well of many that followed them from Lauffe, as also of diversemba sages from the States which assembled at Lariffa, and were desirous to carry home with them certain news of the fequel, which they fhould bear. Every man bad an inward defire felled in his beart O to feethe maner of the meeting of this noble K. & thefe high commissioners from the foveraign state and mightiestypeople of the whole world. Being come to the enterview one of another, they ftond fill on either fide of the river, which only parted them alunder. For a while there palsed entercourriers between whiles they made it strange on both parts, who should pass the river full, for the Macedonians food tomewhat upon the totall majefty of a King; & the Romans were as

A respective to the reputation of the people of Rome, considering withall, that Petfens lought the means & made first motion for this parley, Whereupon, to end this controverse, Martius cast out a merry word. What needs all this (qd, he) let the younger come to the elder without more ado, and the fon to the father this he spake, for that himself and was surnamed Philip. The K. soon condescended thereunto. But then arose another doubt and difference, namely, with what number he should pass over. The K. thought it meet & convenient to come with his whole train : but the legats would have had him either to bring over with him three persons, and ho more; or else if he were minded to pass with fo great a company; to put in hostages for assurance, that during the time of the parley no outrage should be committed. So Perfous sent as pledges, Hippias & Pansanchus, the principal and most especial friends that were about him, whom also he had employed B in the embaffage. Now were these hostages required, not so much for a gage & pawn of security, as that it might appear unto the allies there present, that the K in meeting and communing with the Roman Commissioners, should not keep state comparable with him, but abate somewhat of of the port and majecty which they carried. Their mutual greeting and faluration was nothing ftrange, as between enemies; but kind and amiable, as among familiar triends. Which done, they fat them down upon their chairs fet ready for them. After they had thus fitten a while in filence and faid nothing, Martius began in this manner: "You expect (Isuppose gd, he) that we should The Ocation "answer to your letters which you sent to Corcyra, wherein you demand, Why we are come in of Martime bi-"embaffie and commission after this manner with armed souldiers, and plant garrisons as we do line at the King " in every City ? Markin for that time accorded to his freech, and moved him to address emballadors to Romo beging of advice and opinion himlest to try all means to the very last point, and to the tilp posthing wheterof fome hope of good might artie. It remained only to be debated in councill, how emballadors might pais in latery. And to this purpole, when Only to be designed in the K.to request a increase of arms, a best Marriss himself was willing and set-firous thereof (for that his diffe was to nothing elle by all this conference and parkey yet the feemed to make a hard matter and difficulty of it, and to do a special favour and pleasure unto Persons in B granting his petition. The truth was, the Romans yet were not ready nor throughly appointed at this present forthe war; they had neither army pulsant enough, nor captains inflicient; whereas Perfess (but that he was blinded in all fils councils with a vain hope of peace) had all things prepared and in readiness, and might then have begun to wage war, as in the best and most opportone featon for himfelf, to the worst and unfittest of all other times for his enemies,

After this parley and the abilimence of war afford faithfully on both parts, the Roman Commissioners were appointed and resolved to go into Bantia, where there was begun already some trouble and commotion, by reason that certain States of the Bootians were departed from the fociety of the common Conneill, ever fince it was reported back, how the Roman Legats made answer that it should appear and be seen, what Cities they were indeed which took no pleasure C to have any affociation with the King. And first, the embassadors from Cheroneas asterwards from Thebes encountred them sponthe way, who assured them, that they were not present in that Diet and Councill, where this affociation was concluded. To thete embassages no answer for this time was made, but willed they were only to give their attendance and follow them to Chalcia.

At Thebes great variance there was, which arose by occasion of another strife and debate. In their folemin affembly for the election of the Prator of the Bootians that pare which had the repulle, in revenige of that in jury and dilgrace, affembled the multitude and made a decree at Theler, That the Recotarches should not be received within their Cities: in such fort, as like banished men they retired to Thefinim: from whence for received there they were incontinently without any flay theing called again to Thebe, upon better advicement and change of mind, they made

By these remobilitances induced they were insomed as at the arrival of the Roman Legats atoresaid, they were able to show unto them an atmato of 40 thips ready rigged and well appointed, that they might know and lee, they looked not for to be exhoned thereunto. And this embassage was of great moment and importance also to gain the hearts of the States in Afia. Only Decimin returned to Rome without any effect of his errand and commission, nay, he ran into an ill name and obloquy, upon supportion that he had received certain bribes of the Princes in Illyricum, Perlan upon the conference and communication had with the Romans, retired into Macedon and fent his Embassadors to Rome, to treat about the conditions of peace begun already with Matina: to other Embaffadors alfo of his he gave his letters to carry to Byzantium and Resist the tenor of which letters was one and the fame directed to them all: namely. From Heraclealike wifeout of the Sintians country there were three thousand Thracians, free-men born, under a leader of their own. The like number well-near of Cretenfians followed their Commanders, Sufus of Phalafarna and Syllan of Gnofos : also Leonides the Lacedamonian had the charge of five hundred R out of Greece, but a mixt company they were of divers nations. This Leonides was faid to have been of the bloud royall a banished perion condemned in a frequent assembly and Councill of the Achgans, for certain letters which he fent to Perfens, and were intercepted. The Atolians and Beetians, who in all made not above five hundred, were conducted by Lyca an Achaan. There auxiliaries or aid-fouldiers of to many states and nations mixt and blended together, grew fast upon the number of 12000 armed men. As for the Cavalry, he had levied out of all Macedons 2000 horse or thereabout. Corrs King of the Odrysians, the son of Seather, was thither come with 1 000 cholen men of arms and almost as many too men. In lum, the whole army arose to the number of 20000 foot and 4000 horiemen. And this was held for certain that the like army was never raised by any King of Macedonr, unless it were that again, with which Alexander the Great C paffed over into Alia. I wenty years now and his were come and gone, have time that peace was granted unto Philip at his own fuit and request during which space between, Macidors being in rest and quietness, had brought forth a goodly fry of fresh youth: a great part whereof was of fufficient age to bear arms; and by the continual skirmithes which they maintained with the Thracians their neighbours, were rather whetted than weakned, and more enured than wearied? and, in one word, lived ever in practice of martiall teats: whereby it came to pais, that all things were preft and in readings for the war, which Philip first; and Perfere afterwards projected to wage against the Romans.

This army flirred and advanced alietle, not in manner of a full march as to a prefent battell; but only for this that they would not be feen to have flood Hill in their arms: and thus armed as D the fouldiers were, Perfew called them to an audience, intending to make an Oration unto them. After that the victorious enemies were upon their return into the camp all were jocund & glad in general, but above the rest the Thracians shewed themselves in joy for this their victory, over infolent : for they returned finging full metrily, and carried the heads of their enemies fixed upon D their spear-points, But the Romans were not only sad and heavy for this unfortunat journey, but fearfull alio left the enemy should forthwith affail their camp, Eumenes gave counsell to dislodge and remove to the other fide of the river Peneus, that it might ferve them inflead of a defence and bulwark, untill fuch time as the amated fouldiers had recovered their spirits and taken heart again, The Col, was ashamed and abashed to bewray his fear; howbeit over-ruled with reason. he fet his army over the river in the dead time of the night, and encamped on the father bank; K. Perfess the morrow after advanced forward to bid the enemies battel, but perceiving they were lodged in fafery beyond the river, he confessed that he had faulted indeed for that he had not followed his victory the day before; but more overfeen a good deal he was in lying fill and, taking repole that night: for without troubling any elfe of his own men, he might have fent out the light. armed fouldiers only corfet upon the enemies as they passed over the river in haste and fright, and to defeated a great part of their forces. Now the Romans shook off their feat for the present, confidering they were encamped in a lure place; but among other damages, the blot especially of their honour and name grieved and troubled them, And as they late in Councill before the Conful, every man for his part laid all the blame upon the Ætolians, who first began to be affraid and run away; and whole example of fear the other allies of the Cities of Greecafollowed: for it was faid, that five principall men of mark among the Atolians, were feen and noted first of all other to have surged their backs. But the Theffalians were praifed in a full affembly of the whole army; and their Captains for their vertugand valorous fervice were honoured with prefents. Thus the affembly was diffolved, and the morrow after the King marched forward and encamped about Monfeles, which is an hill fituat in the mid way between Tempe and Lariffa. The Romans rentoved their camp into a place of more security, howbeit, not far from the bank of Peners. Thirtief lepaired Misagenes the Numidian, with 1000 horse and as many foor, besides 22 Elephants, Now as K. Perfens during these daies, fat in Council what course to take as touching the main conduct of his affairs, when his courage was now well abated and not fo lufty for his late victory, fome of his friends were so hardy as to advise him to use this good fortune of his for the obtaining and compassing of some honourable peace, rather than upon a vain hope to carry his head aloft; and engage himself and his whole state into some hazard & jeopardy, our of which he should not be able to recover and retire into fafety. For to keep a mean and moderation in prosperity, and not over-confidently to trust upon the present flattering fortune, is the part (fay they) of a wise man indeed and truly happy. And therefore the best course is, to fend certain men of purpose unto the Cof, for to renew the league upon the same conditions, with which your father Philip had accepted peace heretofore of T. Quintius the conqueror. For neither (lay they) can the war be taken up with greater honour and reputation, than after so memorable a battel; por ever will there be presented more firm and assured hope of a peace to continue for ever, than upon this occasion, which will work and mollifie the Romans as a man would have them, to come on and affent to any accord confidering they are well tamed with the infortunity of this battell. But in tale the Romans upon an inbred peevishness and engraffed pertinacity of theirs, should not hear reason but refuse an indifferent end, then both God and man shall be witness, as well of the moderation of Perfess, as of their pride & infolent frowardness. The K, was willing enough to give ear to this, and indeed never milliked fisch discourses; and therefore the advice was approved by the allent I of the most part ; whereupon embassadors were sent to the Col, & in a frequent Council ssembled, had audience given them. Peace they demanded, and promifed that Perfeus should pay unto the Romans as great a tribute as Philip had covenanted for 3 and likewise quit the same Cities, coals, and territories, which Philip had given up and furrendred. To this effect spake the embalsadors; who being retired aside, the Romans debated in Council, and in the end, Roman constancy imported and had the upper hand: for in those daies the manner and nie was, in time of adversity to bear all out and set a good countenance, but inprosperity to hold an even hand and to use governance. So agreed it was to return this answer, That peace might be granted with this condition, That K. Perfens should permitfull and free power to the Senat of Rome, for to dispose both of his person and the kingdom of Macedony at their good pleasure. When the Embassadors M had made relation hereof, this constant resolution and invincible persistance of the Romans made them to wonder again, as being not acquainted with their manners and fashions: and most of them forbad to make mention any more of peace, Taying. That the Romans would be glad fliored ly to feek for that of their own accord, which now at this present they loathed & rejected when it was offered. But Perseus mightily feared, that this arrogant spirit of theirs, proceeded from the confidence they had in their own forces; infomuch as he gave not over fo, but affaied to tempt the Cos. if haply by augmenting the sum of money, he might buy peace at any price & reckoning what soever, But seeing him nothing to come down, nor to alter one jot from the first answer in despair now of all peace, hereturned to Sycariam from whence he came, purposing once again to try the hazard of the field. Now the fame of this late fight of cavalry was flown over all Greece, N and discovered the minds and affections of men: for not only they that took part with the Macedonians rejoyced to hear this news, but also very many of them who were obliged and beholden unro the Romans for benefits and favours received at their hands, and some likewise who had taffed of their violence and proud government. And this they did for no other reason at all, but only upon a foolish and perverse affection, like to that wherewith the common people ordinarily is carried away in the beholding ordifports and triall of masteries, even to favour evermore the weaker and him that taketh the foil. At the same time Lucretins the Prator had with most forcible means affailted the City of Ha-

Hintin in Bacita: and about the before defendant within were relieved by no fortain aid, but only the youth of the Coronauns who at the beginning of the fiege entered the City) nor hoped of or any to come; yet they flood out and made relifance with courage of heart more than with frength of hand: for they lifted forth mady times, and fallied upon the fabricks and engine of the enemy, yea & when the ram approached hard to the wall, tiey let fall theretipon a mighty weight and counterpoile of lead and to depreted and drave he down to the ground. And it haply the enemies who ran with the ram against the wall, avoided the device of theirs, laid battery, and shook it in loane other place; the townsines within, raifed prefently with great speed another mme, piling up hadly the stones one upon mother which they found lying among the very rains of the breaches. The Conful feeing this manner of forvice by way of ordnance and battery, to become flow and sedious, commanded to divide adders among the very company, and purposed to invest the City round about with the Escalado improfing that the number which he had would be figh ficient to exploit this emergrife, became, on that fide wheteasthe Town is enclosed with a mariful it was bootless or father unpossible) to affault it. Himself in person presented 2000 elect fouldiers before that part, whereas two turrets, and all the wall between was beaten down and overthrownito the end that in the very inflant, whiles he affaied to enter at the breaches the townimen should run all thither to repulse him, and in the mean while the walls told of the town might in some part or other be scaled and won. But they within bestired themselves shally to B give him the repulse. For having piled in the very open breathes a mighty number of faggots made of drievine cuttings and such small brush, they stood ready with slaming firebrands and burning links, threatning ever and anon to kindle the fame and fet all on fire, to the end, that heing defended from the enemy by the means of fire between, they might have time to oppole an inner countermute against them. But by mischance this device and enterprise of theirs was empeached, For there ponred down on a fuddain fuch a mighty shower of rain, that the fewel would not easily take fire, and look what was fet a burning, it foon was quenched again. By which means not only the passage was made open between the smoking saggots drawn apart one from another here and there, but whiles they all intended wholly the defence of that one place, the walls were taken at one instant by ladders reared up against many and fundry parts thereof. In the first heat C upon the winning of the City, old and yong, fuch as chanced to come in their way, without any respect at all of age were put to the sword. The armed souldiers fled into the Castle, and the next day being past hope to make good the place, they yeelded and were all fold under the garland in portiale, to them that would bid moft, to the number of 2500 men or very neer. The ornaments and beauties of the City, as statues, images, painted tables and pictures, and whatsoever was found in the pillage to bear a better price, was caried to shipbord, and the Town it self rased from the very foundations, and laid even with the ground. From thence the army was conducted to Thebes: which being won without any refiftance he put into the hands of the banished persons, and those that took part and fided with the Romans; but those of the contrary faction, such as favoured the King and the Macedonians, he fold by whole families in open market to the best chapmen, Having

D performed these exploits in Baoita, heretired himself to the Seashede to his ships,

- Whiles these affairs passed thus in Baoita, Perseau lodged for certain daies in camp at Sycariam;

Where being advertised, that the Romans made great hast to into the corn newly respect down, and to cary it from all parts of the fields unto the leaguer, and that every souldier before his tens cut and shred off the ears as they lay bound in sheaves, to the end they might that hand drive out the cleather corn, by which ocasion they had made great heaps of straw throughout all parts of the camp, he supposed it was an easy matter to set all their tents and pavillions on fire. Where upon he commanded to provide rorches, links and balls made of row bestmeared with pitch and tar: thus provided and servisis sheet out at midnight, that by the dawning of the day, he might put this device in execution without being described before. But all came to nothings or the formost corp, diguard although they were surprised with this students coming, by their trouble and finish a wakened and raised all the rest, and immediatly the alarm was given; so as at one instant the souldiers were ready and well appointed at the gates, and upon the rampier bent and prest for to defend the camp. Perseas likewise incontinently turned about with his ensigns putting his fardage and cartiage before, and then commanded the insantry to march after: himself with the cavalry and light-atmors staied behind to fortify and guard the rereward, supposing (as it fell out indeed) that the enemies would make after to charge upon the tail of the march. His light armed fouldiers had some short skirmishing especially with the forlorn hope and loose avant-courriers, but the horse and southern both, retired without any impeachment into the camp. Thus when all the corn was cut down about those quarters, the Romans dislodged and removed into the terrification, which as yet was not endammaged. Whiles they lay encamped in se urity and milituding nothing (because the enemies were so far off, and by tealon that the way between Spicial and Crannon was so difficult for want of water;) behold all on a sudd in early in the morning by day light, the Kings cavalry and light armed souldiers shewed themselves upon the hills that overslooked them from above, and put them into great trouble. Departed they were should be some and the standard of the standard should be the standard of the

But when, they saw that its their diffuseth they kept close together following their guidons and keeping their ranks they slic returned into the camp. After this, the King weaty of making so long journies, disloyed and knowed to Mapfium. The Komans for their patt skewise having mowed down all the corn of Crannon, passed into the teristory of Phalanneum. who marching with as great haft as possibly they comiddes upon the Romans at unimates all upprovided; where he took a thouland cares or sheeced out a together watth beistesms mort of them laden and upon 600 men beides. The guard and conboy of this being into the camp he commitzed to the charge of 300 Cretephans. Himlelf having sallied his cavalry dispersed here and there buy, in execution, and remitted with a their reflor febt in others, but a from the new production of the enemies, supposing that with little ado they might be surprised and another production. L. Pamprine a Colonel had the command of them, who feeing his founders affrighted with this fuddain coming of the enemies retired with them to an hill neer at hand for to defend himfelf by the vartage and firength of the place, confidering that otherwile in number and forces the was son weak. Where after he had call his men into a ringy for to ward against the shot of alrows and darts by a roof and fence of targets couched close together over their heads : Perfeur having envi- I roned the hill round about with armed men, commanded fome to mount up and affay to win the place on all parts, i: possibly they could and then to fight close hand to hand others he charged to lance their darts and shoot their shafts thick at them a far off. The Romans were beset with a double fear; for neither could they maintain skirmish and fight close together because of those who laboured to climb the hill: and fay they had broke any ranks with excursions and outrodes upon them, yet were they exposed and lay open to the shot of arrows and darts. Most hurt they had by certain weapons called Ceftrofphendona fling dares. A new kind of dare this was and lately devised in the time of this very war. It had a fliarp head of iron the length of two hands breadth, and the same set fast in a steel which was half a cubit long, and about the thicknes of a mans finger: for to flie direct and ftreight, three teathers it had about it in man of a shaft: the K fling from the middle part had two cords of an unequal fize: now when as the flinger fwung it about, as it lay even poiled in the greater capacity of the leather thong out flew the dart and was driven with violence like a bullet. Many of the fouldiers being very fore wounded as well with this weapon as all other forts of thot, fo as now for wearines they were scarceable to bear their own armour : the King was earneftly in hand with them to yeeld and fubmit; affuring them upon his faithful word their lives, yea and other whiles promised them rewards and recompences, But there was not a man whose heart enclined once thereto. Now as they flood thus fliff and resolutto die there shone upon thema little comfort and some hope of evasion beyond all their expectation. For certain of the forragers and corn purveiors, who hapned to flie for refuge unto the camp, brought word unto the Conful, hat the corps de guard a forelaid was befieged sound; wher- L upon being moved with the jeopardy wherein to many citizens flood (for about 900 they were, and all citizens of Rame) he went forth of the camp with the cavalry and light, aimed fouldiers, and unto them joyned certain new succours of the Numidians as well horse as foot, together with the Elephants: and gave commandment to the martial Colonels, that the enfigue of the legions. should follow after. Himself in person marched before toward the hill aforesaid taking with him a certain number of skirmishers, for to strengthen the light armed auxiliaties. Eumenes, Attalus, and M. Jagenes also the King of the Numidians, flanked the Coi, on either side. When as the befieged Romans had a fight once of the formost enfigns of their friends and fellows, they cook comfort and conrage again upon their former extream despair. Persen, who had purposed in the first place not to spend any long time in laying fiege to this corps deguard but to content himself with M the fortunat fuccels which at a venture happed, in that he had taken and flain some of the fortagers: lecondly(when he was in some fort entred into that action) to depart (whiles he had means thereof) without any damage received, as knowing that he had no strength, to speak of, about him : yet puffed up and caried as it were above the ground with the conceit of his late good hand, both flaid in person to attend the enemies coming, and also fent out in all hast for the Macedonian] Phalanx. Which coming later than the present necessity required falbeit in great hast they hurried) it fell out fo, that they were to encounter (troubled and difordred as they were in running) their enemies that were well appointed and provided aforehand. And the Cof. who had prevented them prefently welcomed them with battail. At the first, the Macedonians made refiflance; but afterwards being in no respect equal unto the enemies, after they had lost three hundred footmen with four and twenty of the most forward and bravest horsemen out of that cornet which they call Sacra (amongst whom Animachus also their leader died) they endeavoured to settre and be gone. But the way by which they were to pais, was more troublefome to speak of, than the skirmish and battail it self. The Phalanx being sent unto by a messenger in hast, and conducted as haffily, encountred affront in a certain streight a troop of prisoners, and likewisethe Waggonscharged with corn. Who being laid at to give way, thereupon arole a great trouble as well of the one part as the other; whiles no man took heed how to march in order: but the armed iouldiers cast down and overthrew the heaps of fardage and baggage, for otherwise there, could no way be made: and the draught-beafts being pricked and provoked forward, raged and made foul work in the preis and throng. Hardly and with much ado were they disengaged and o rid of this confused and disordered company of captives, when they mer, with the King his company and the horsemen discomsited. In which place, the noise which they made crying unto the Phalanx. Back again Back again made a fright among them as if there had been something ready to fall upon their heads: in fuch fort as if their enemies durft have entred into the freight and purford farther after them, no doubt they had received a great overthrow, But the Conful consenses himself with a mean good hand, in that he had rescued and recovered his corps de guard topic of

A the hill, regized with his forces into the camp. Somewrite that there was a great battail fought that day, and how 8000 coemies were thin; and among them Sopater and Aminater two of the Kings Capeains. Also that there were ratemptifoness about 3400: and military engos 27 caried away. Neither was the victory easily gotten but each blood, for not so few 45,4300 were slain of the Conful his army and in eguidous of the left wing loft. This journey recomforted the Romans, but danted and quality Performin facts force, as after he had shall a few dates as Adaptitus, especially ally about entering the bodies of his dead fouldiers, and left a fufficient garrifon at Gomes, he retired his army into Macidony, leaving also at Phila one of his own Captains named Timotheus. with some small forces, whom he commanded to affay the Magnesians and the borderers adjoyning. When he was come to Pella, he dismiffed his akmy out of the field, and sent them to their B wintring harbors, but himself together with King Corys went to The flatonica.

Thither news came, that Atlesbius a pety King of the Thracians, and Corragus a Captain under King Eumanes, had invaded the marches of Carys, and were mafters of the country which they call Marene. And therefore supposing that he must needs discharge Corys to look to the defence of his own realm, he bestowed rich presents upon him at his departure: and gave him 200 talents for fix months wages of his cavalry, whereas at the beginning he purposed to be at the charge of a whole years pay.

The Conful after he heard that Perfeus was gone, approached with his army neer to Gonnos, and there lodged; if haply he might force and gain that also, Situat it was over against Tempe, at the very mouth and gullet of the streights, and is the very frontier Town, yeelding both a most assured C defence and frength to all Macedony, and also a commodious passage for the Macedonians to enter into Theffaly. And being a place impregnable, as well for the natural fite thereof, as the firong garrison therein planted, he gave over the enterprise. So turning and bending his way into Perrhabia, after he had forced Mallaa at the first assault and put it to the ransack; and received Tripolis with the rest of Perkebia, yeelded by composition, he returned to Lariffa. And then having fent Eumenes and Assalus home into their own country, and bestowed Misagenes and the Numidians in diversCiries of The fal, neer at hand to remain there for the winter time and distributed part of his forces throughout all Theffuly, in such fort, that not only they had all commodious wintring, but also served in stead of garrisons to the Cities. Q. Mutius his Lieutenant he sent with a regiment of 2000 men to guard Ambracia and keep it in obedience. All the conjederats of the n Greek Cities, save only the Acharans he licensed to depart. With one part of his army he went into Theffals in Philia, where he rafed down to the ground Pteleum abandoned of the inhabitants. But Antrona he won with the good will of the Townsmen. Then afterward he approached before Lariffa with his forces. The City was left defolat, for all the people were retired into the forces, the which he beganto assault: and first the Kings garrison of Macedonians quit the place: of whom the Townsmen being for aken and left to themselves, submitted incontinently. Then he ftood indoubt whether he should affail Demerias first, or have an eye and look into the troubles and state of Bastia, For the men of Thebes being grievously molested and annoted by those of Coronas, had lent for him into Bastia: at whole praiers, thither he conducted his army; and befides, Baotia was a country more commodious to winter in than Magnefia,

For which rigour of his, the captives whom he hadfold under the garland in open market, were by anorder directed out of the Senat, reftored afterward to their former offate. The Admirals of the Roman fleets committed many outrages and enormities against their allies. Besides, there are comprised in this book, the prosperous off airs of King Peticus in Thracesaster he had vanquished the Dardanians and subdued lllyricum, whereof Gentius was King. The troubles which the state of the contraction of the state began in Spain by meant of Olonicus, were appealed by his death, M. Emylius Lepidus, was by the Confors created president of the Senat.

He fame furnimer, wherein the Romans wan the victory with horse-fight in The flaty, the Lieutenant being fent into Illyricam from the Conful, compelled by force and arms two fich Towns to yeeld; unto which nevertheless he gave all their goods again, to the end that by an opinion of this clemency, he might win the hearts of the inhabitants of Carnut, this from City, But when he faw that he could not confirm them to render, no more h than force them by tege; because his fouldiers should not feeth to have been wearied for none in the belieging of two Towns, he fell to rifle and smileck that, which before he left introducted The other Conful C. Caffin neither performed any memorable exploit in Caul, which was fire Province by lot ; and having endeavoured to conduct his legions through Thiritim into Maccal mr, all his designment came to no effect at all. That the Conful was entred upon this journey the Senat was certified by the Embafiadors of the Aquileians a who complained that their colony newly erected was feeble, and not as yet well fecured antong those fierce nations of Illitians and Hyrians : and withal they made fuit, that the Senat would provide and take order, that the faid colony might be fortified : and when the question was put unto them, Whether they would be content that commission should be directed unto C. Cassini in that behalf? they answered, That I the faid Coffins, having affembled his army at the Rendez vous it Aquileia, was departed through Sclavonia into Macedony. This at first was thought incredible, and every man supposed verily, that he had been gone to levy war upon the Carnians haply of the Istrians, The Aquileians were able to reply no farther, nor affirm more upon their knowledge than this, That allowance of com was made for the fouldiers to serve thirty daies, and that guids were fought and brought out, who knew the waies out of Italy into Macedony. Hereat the Senate (ye may be fure) took great finust and was highly displeased, that the Consul should be so hardy as presume to leave his own proving for to pass into that which belonged to another, and to lead his army an unknown and new way, and the same dangerous, through strange and forrain countries, thereby to open past fage as it were, for fo many nations to come into Italy. Whereupon in a frequent affembly of g the Senators, there passed a decree, That C. Sulpitius the Pretor should nominat three Embassadors ont of the body of the Senat, for to depart out of the City that present day, to make all the haft they possibly could to overtake the Conful wheresoever he was, and to give him warning to levy no war against any nation without direct warrant from the Senat. And these Embassisdors went, namely, M. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Fulvius, and P. Martius Rex. The present fear as touching the Conful and the army, was the occasion that the care of fortifying Aquileia was deferred

After this, were the Embaffadors of certain States in both Provinces of Spain admitted to come into the Senat: who complained of the covetouines and pride of the Roman Officers and Governors among them ; humbly beleething the Senat upon their knees, Not to luffer them (being L allies and confederats) to be more shamefully pilled and spoiled than the very enemies. Among other indignities for which they shewed themselves aggrieved, notorious it was, that the said Magistrats had taken bribes, yea, and nied extortion in wringing mony from them. Whereupon a commission was granted to L. Canuleius the Pretor (unto whom Spain by lot was faln) to ordain. five judges or commissioners (and those our of the rank and degree of Senators) for every person of whom the Spaniards claimed to recover such monies; and likewise to permit the plaintiffs to take unto them what Advocats and Counsel they would. Then, after those Embassadors were called again into the Senat, this decree and act of the Senat was read unto them, and willed they were to nominat their Advocats) who named four, to wit, M. Porcius Cato, P. Cornelius Scipio the fon of Cn.us, L. Emplius Paulus the fon of Marcus, and C. Sulpitius Gallus. And first they M rook commissioners to proceed against M. Titinius, who had been Pretor in the hither Province ot Spin, when An Manlius and M. Junius were Confuls. Twice was the cause of the accused party adjourned to a farther time, but at the third fession he was quit and found unguilty. Then ero'e lome variance and diffention between the Emballadors of those two Provinces, The states of this higher Spain, took for their patrons and Advocats, M. Cato and Scipio ; they of the farther and lower Spain, made choice of L. Panlus and Gallus Sulphins. They of high Spain convented before the delegate judges, P. Furius Philus ; the other of the base Spain, M. Matienus, Philus had, been L. Deputy there three years palt, when Sp. Posthumius and Q. Mutius were Confuls; but this Matienus two years before, during the Confulfhip of L. Posthumius and M. Populius. Charged they were both of them with right grievous matters and imputations, and a fatther daygran. N ted of a final judgment : but when they were to answer judicially again, they made default, and for excuse it was alledged, that they were both out of the country; and so they departed into voluntary exile, Furins to Praneste, and Matienus to Tyber. The voice went, that the patrons of the plaintifs would not suffer them to follow process fill against such noble and great perfonages: and the suspition hereof was more pregnant, by realon that Consider, the Pretor let this matter fall, and began to take musters and levy souldiers for the war; and so forth with directly went into the Province, to the end that no more men should be brought into question and troubled by these Spaniards. By this means, all former matters past were buried in silence and no more speech made of them; but for suture time, the Senat took order and provided for the Spaniards fo well, that they obtained an immunity, That no Roman Magistrate should have power and au- o thority to fet the price npon any grain, nor forcethe Spaniards to fell the Vicefines at what rate he pleased to set down: also that there should be no commissioners appointed within their Towns for the gathering and receiving of the revenues and mony issuing from thence. Befides, there came another embaffy of a fort of people out of Spain, after a new and firange manner : for there were above four hundred perfons, avouching themselves the children of Roman souldiers and Stahish women not joyned in wedlock: who appeared before the Senar and befought them, for

Being entred the comp and the wing the heads aloft, they firm k fuch a fear, that if immediatly the army had come for ward and advanced against them, the camp might have been won: and yes even then as it was, they fled amain: and forme there were who give their opinion, to fend Emballadors to treat and with praiers to intreat for peace. Upon the news reported hereof, many Cities submitted and were surrendred. Such as made excise, and laid the fault upon the folly of two persons only, who had of their own accord offered themselves to be punished, obtained pardon

this answer, That as touching the outrages for which they shewed themselves grieved, the Senat H neither knew thereof beforehand, that ever they were intended, nor yet approved of the lane, fince they were committed. But against all right and equity, it were to condemn unheard in his own defence, and ablent, such a personage as he is, namely, a man who had been Consul; confedering also that his emploiment about the C.W. is the occasion of his absence. When C. Cassimia once returned out of Macedony, then if they would how themselves and accuse him faces o face, the Senat would hear the caule and take knowledge accordingly, yea, and endeavour that they should be farisfied and contented. Moreover, thought good it was that these nations should not be dispatched only with this bare answer, but that Embassadors also should be sent two unto the forefaid King beyond the Alps: and other three to the people above named, for to acquaint them with the resolution of the Lords of the Senat. And they gave order besides to send presents o I each of the Embassadors to the value of two thousand Asses over and above, to the two Princes that were brethren, these gifts following, to wit, two chains of gold weighing after they were wrought five pound of gold: also five peeces of plate in filver, amounting to the weight of twenty pound two bard horses with their riders and lackies: likewise horsemens armour and their cassocks: and liveries likewise for all those of their train, as well bond as free. These were the things fent unto them. But at their own request granted it was besides, that they might for their mony buy each of them ten hories, and be allowed to transport them out of Italy. The Embassiadors lent with the Gauls beyond the mountains, were C. Letius and M. Emylius Lepidus: to the Other nations C. Sicinius, P. Cornelius Blafio, and T. Memmius,

Moreover, there met together in Rome at once, the Embaffadors of many States both of Greece K and Afa. And first the Athenians were brought into the Senat, who related, That they had sent and same, And in Alexander and the Pretor G. Lucreiins, what thipping they had, and all the fighting men they were able to make . but feeing they had no use of them, they had raised a levy of a hundred thousand Modii of corn. Which, albeit their land was but barren for tillage, and the very husbandmen themselves lived of forrain corn brought in unto them, yet they had made means to do accordingly, because they would not seem to be wanting in any dutiful service: and willing they were yet, and prest to perform whatsoever they would require. The Milesians for their part faid, That hitherto they had done nothing, marry they offred themselves to be ready to accomplish all that the Senat should command them toward this war. The Alabandians shewed, That they had built a * Temple to the City of Rome, and ordained befides, that in the honour of that I goddels there should be a solemnity of games and plaies exhibited every year. Also, that they had brought with them for a present, a crown of gold weighing fifty pound, to set it up in the Capi-tol as a gift and offering to Iup. Opt. Max. and withal, three hundred horsmens shields, which they were minded to bestow upon those unto whom it pleased them to appoint and command. Their petition was, that they might be permitted to offer their present in the Capitol, and there to sacrifice. The men of Lamplacus came with a golden crown weighing fouricore pound, protefling, That they had quit and abandoned Perfess, foloon as ever the Roman army was arrived in Mecedony, notwithit anding they owed allegeance unto Perfess, and were homagers to his father Philip before him. In which confideration as also for that they had performed their devoir to their full power to the Roman Generals, they requested no other favour to be gratified withal, but M to be received into the amity of the people of Rome; and in case there should be peace concluded with Perfens, that they might be excepted and exempted in the accord, for being reduced under his obedience. The rest of the Embassadors had a gracious answer returned unto them. As for the Lampiacens, order was given to Q. Manins the Pretor, to enter and enrolthem in the number of allies. Every one of these Embassadors were rewarded with a present worth two thousand Affes. The Alabandians were appointed to carry back with them into Macedony their shields aforesaid, and to deliver them unto A. Hoftilius the Consul. Over and besides, the Carthaginian Embaffadors out of Africk, made relation that they had brought from thence ten hundred thoufund Modii of wheat, and five hundred thouland of barley, which they had on shipboard at the fea-side ready to cary the same wheresoever the Senat would appoint. This benevolence of theirs N

they accompanied with good words, faying, they knew well that this gift and recognisance of their duty, was inferior either to their own good will, or the demerits of the people of Rome, Howbeit many times heretofore they had shewed themselves to do the part of thankful, faithful, and trufty allies, in all things tending to the profit and good of both flates. In like fort the Employee basladors of Masanissa promised the same proportion of corn, with 1200 horse, and twelve Elephants, afturing them in his name, to do whatfoever the Senate would impose and should be thought needful; and that with as free an heart as the benevolence offered of his own accord. Thanks being given both to the Carthaginians and also to the King, requested they were to transport over into Macedony to the Conful A. Hofilius, those things which they had promised. To the Embassadors were sent by way of presents, two thousand Asses apeece. The Cretensian Embaffadors, related how they had fent into Macedony fuch a number of Archers, as the Contel P.

Lieinius had imposed upon them: and when they denied not upon the question asked, that there ferved more Archers of theirs under Perfeus than with the Romans, this answer was made unto them, That if the Cretensians would well and truly and in good earnest prefer the friendship of the people of Rome before that of King Perfeus, the Senat of Rome likewise would give them anfwer as certain and assured allies : in the mean while, they should let their country-men to underIn fland that it was the will and pleasure of the Senat, that the Cretenians should with all speed posfible call home all those fouldiers whom they had in any garrison of King Perfeus, The Candiors being difmissed with this dispatch, then the Chakidians were called in : and at the very first siehe of them, it foon appeared upon what terms of necessity they were driven to fend an embassage : when Miscion the chief man among them, by occasion that he was same with the gout in his feet, was brought into the Senat in a litter, in which extremity difeated as he was, there was no pleadine of any excuse by his infirmity, nor craving pardon, fince he was to go without, when he had all done. He began by way of preface and preamble, faying, "He had nothing left alive but his tongue for to deplote and bewail the calamities of his country : then he went forward, and first 106 shewed what courtefies and good turns the State wherin he lived had performed to the Captains

Both General and armies of the Romans, both of old, and also of late in the war against Perfeut, After this he declared what parts of pride; coverousnes, and cruelty, first, C. Lucretius a Roman Pretor " had exercised upon his country-men, and afterwards what L. Hortenfius practised, at that time staboveall others: also how the Chalcidians were resolved to endure all calamities, were they " more grievous than those which they presently suffred rather than they would yeeld to Persent And as for Lucretius and Hortenfius, they knew full well, that it had been better and more for "their fafety to have shuttheir gates against them, than to receive them into their City. For such se as had excluded them forth, as namely, they of Emathia, Amphipolis, Maronea, and Ensi, remain A fill entire and in good estate; but with us (tay they) the Temples have been robbed of all their se beautiful ornaments and utterly spoiled by these facriledgers, C. Lucretius hath carried all away C "by water over to Anium, and liath led away into bondage and captivity the persons free born.

"So as the goods and formbes of the allies of the people of Rome, both have been and daily are pilseled & rifled. For according to the use & fashion brought up by C. Lucretius, Hortensius likewise "houleth his mariners as well in fummer as winter, and our houses are ful of a rabble of these sailers er and fea-men, in such fort as our wives and children be forced to converse among such grooms as make no account at all what either they fay or do, Hereupon thought good it was, to fend for Lucretini into the Senat; that he might fee his accuser, answer face to face, and purge himself of these challenges, But when he was come in place, he heard much more in presence, than had been spoken against him in his absence. Overand besides, there shewed themselves and joined together against him two other more stout adversaries and bitter accusers, to wit, M. Iuventius Talva and

Den. Auf dins. And these two not only coursed him before the Senat, but also having drawn him perforce into the general affembly of the people, and charged him before them with many reproaches, took out process also and arrested him to make his appearance and answer judicially at a day before the people. Then Q. Manius the Pretor, by order from the Senat, answered the Chalcidians in this manner: Wheras ye alledge and fay, That ye have well deferved of the people of Rome both heretofore and also in this present war now in hand, the Senat knoweth all that to be true, and accepteth the same thankfully in the best part, as of right they ought. As touching your grievances and complaints for the lewd parts which C. Lucretius hath plaied, and which L. Hortenfius fill practifeth (both Pretors of Rome) the same neither have been nor are committed and done by the will and allowance of the people of Rome. For who would not judge to of it, that knoweth how

E they levyed war upon King Perfeus and his father Philip before him, for to enfranchise Greece and feet it at liberty; and not that their allies and friends should thus hardly be intreated by their Magiftrats and Governors fent from hence ? Write therfore they would unto L. Hortenfins the Pretor, to let him understand, that the Senate is not well pleased with these pranks of his which the Chalcidians complain of. Also if any free born persons were become thrall and bound, that with all convenient speed he should take order to seek them up and restore them again to their former freedom. Last of all that they deemed it meet and reason, that no sailer or mariner, but only the masters of ships should be lodged and emercained in your houses. And these were the contents of the letters written unto Hortenfins, by commandment from the Senate. Unto the Embassadors were gifts fent, to every one asmuch as came to 2000 Asses. As for Miccion, he was allowed his F carriage in chariots at the charges of the City, and order given that he should with all ease ride in them to Brandusium. As for C. Lucretius, when the day of appearance was come, the Tribuns commenfed anaction against him before the people, to be a fined at a million of Asses. And in a generall affembly and Seffion holden for this purpose, cast he was and condemned by the suffrages of all the tribes, even thirty five and no fewer. In Ligaria no memorable exploit was that year performed: for neither the enemies entred into arms, nor the Conful led his legions into their country; and when he was affured of peace for that year, he discharged the souldiers of two Roman legions, within 60 daies after his first coming into the Province. Asfor the army of the Latine allies, he brought it early into the Cities of Luna and Pifa there to winter : and then himself with the cavalry visited most of the Cities in the Province of Gaul. In no place was there any war but in Macedony: howbeit they had in suspition Gentius and the King of the Illyrians. Therefore the Senate ordained to fend from Brundusium eight ships ready and fully furnished, unto the Lieutenant C. Furius at * Iff a, who was Governor of the Iland with the guard and strength of two Islean Vessels; in which were put aboord and shipped 2000 fouldiers, which Q. Manius the Pretor by a warrant directed out of the Senate, enrolled in that quarter of Italy which lieth opposite to Illyricum. In like manner the Consul Hostelius sent

In the beginning of the year sent following; after that the new Coff. Q. Martius and Q. Septilisus, had moved in the Senat as touching their provinces, advised is was, That with all speed possible they should either agree between themselves, or else cast loss for the governments in Italy and in Maccious, And before shatches lost edetermined this matter so doubtful and uncertain, to the cold that nothing afterwards should be done for favour partially, thought good it was, to ordain before hand a competent and similises number of soulciers for the supplement of the armies in both Provinces; namely, for Macedam 6000 footmen of Romans, and as many of Latine allies; 250 horsemen Romans, and 300 allies: also to cass the old souldiers, so as in every Roman legion there should not be above 6000 foot and 300 liorie. As for the other Conful, he was not gased with any certain flint of Roman citizens, to be levied for the full accomplishment of his legions B Only this was determinatly fet down, That he should enrol two legions, and either of them to contain 5200 foot and 200 horfe: but forfootmen of Latins, he had a greates number allowed than his colleague; namely, toood foot and 600 hoffe. Moreover, commandment was given to enrol four legions more, to be led forth into the field, upon what need and occasion foever should fall out. The Marshal-Colonels of the army the Consuls might not be permitted to elect. but created they were by the people. The allies of the Latine nation were enjoined to fet out fixteen thouland foot and a thouland horse. And this power was only to be in a readiness at an hours warning, for to be led forth as occasion should be offered. Their principal care was about Maerdony. Ordained also it was, That for the service at Sea, there should be enrolled to serve the navy, of the Roman citizens (such as were libertins and newly enfranchised) out of all parts of C Isaly offe thousand, and as many out of Sicily! And unto whether of the Consuls the Province of Masedony fell, he should give order for their transporting thither, to the armado whereforer in was. For Spainshere werethree thousand Roman tootmen and three hundred horsemen appointed to make up the decaied bands. There also, a certain number was set down for every legion. to wit, five thousand foot and three hundred and this ty horie. Moreover, that Conful whoseloc was to govern in Spain, had commission to levy of the allies four thousand footmen, and three hundred horse.

I am not ignorant, that from the same prophane negligence and irreligion, whereby commonly, men now adaies are of belief, that the Gods portend and fore-fignify nothing to come by figns, and tokens ; it proceedeth also, That no prodigies which happen, should any more either be pu-Di blished and reported abroad, or recorded in the annals and chronicles. Howbeit, for mine own part, in writing of these acts and monuments of ancient times, I know not how, but me thinks I cary a mind, that is become (as it were) antique also; yea, and some scrupulous devotion arisett in my spirit, which moveth me to account the things not unworthy to have place in my histories, which those fige fathers and most prudent personages in old time thought meet to be considered of by the State, yea, and to require publick expiation, Well, to proceed, from Anaga awere two featini lights reported that year, namely, That aburning and blasting flame was teen in the skie; and a cow known to speak, kept and nourished at the public k charges. At Minturnal so much about those daies, the welkin seemed to be on a light fire. At Rese there fell a shower that rained stones. In the fortreis at Comes the image of Apollo wept three daies and three nights continually. In the E City of Rome, two featons or keepers of the Temples made report, the one, That in the Church of Fortune there was a Serpent feen by many men, cretted with a mane : the other, That about the chappel of * Fortuna Primigenia, which standerh upon the Capitol hill there hapned two divers * cum primeand different prodigious (gass, namely, That in the Chappel-yard there forung up a palm-tree and gasin famile all one day it rained blood. Two other strange things there were, whereof there was no regard when she was nor account made; the first, because it chanced in a privat place; for T.Marrius Figulus reported; first born for That there grew up a palm or date-tree in his course and the second, because it happed in a softein place for spoken it was, That at Free Main the hold of M. Atreus, a lance of speak which he had bought for his son a fouldier, burned in the day time for two hours space and more, yet so, as the fire confirmed nothing thereof. In regard of those publick prodigies; the Decemvirs had recourse ro the books of Sibylan who out of them declared, That the Confuls should factifice forty head.

They added moreover and gave advice to hold a publick procession, and that all the Magistrats at every shrine and upon every alter of the Gods should facrifice greater beasts, and the people wear garlands and chaplets of flowers. AT chings were secured accordingly, as the Decemvirs suggested and directed. After this, the affembly was published for the chusing of Centors. In election there were for this dignizy of Centorship, the very principal persons and of best note in all the City, C. Valerius

Lavings, L. Pofthamins Albinns, P. Marinis Scarola, C. Junite Louis, C. Claudius Pulcker, and Tib. Sempronius Gracebus. These two last rehearsed the people of Rome those for Confors, When as by occasion of the Macedonian war; a greater care was had about the taking of musters, than at other G times before; the Confuls found much fank with the common people, and complained unto the Sense; that the yong and able men for fervice being called would not answer to their names, But C. Sufprisioned Mr. Clanding two Tribune of the Commons, maintained the cause against them in the behalf of the Commons, faying, That it was no hard and difficult matrer for Confuls so, levy, fouldiers: many for corrupt, affectionse and popular Confule, it was not fo easy a thing, and namely, fuch as would be fure to enrol no fouldiers against their wills. And to the end that the LL. of the Senate might know this to be a truth; they thould fee the Pretors (if the Senate werd,

Moreover because they of element, that many souldiers t of the Macedonian legions were abient from the army, and had obtained large pasports withour Adam, wher- limitation of return; and that through the corruption and favour of the Generals, they published as each Con- an edict as touching the foundiers enrolled for Macedony, when P. Elius and C. Pop lius were Conful hid every fuls, or any time after. That as many of them as remained within Italy, after they were enrolled where twelve, and registred first under their hands, should within thirty dajes repair again to their colours into the province : and whofoever of them were at the disposition of father or grandsire, their names should be presented and declared before them. Semblably, they would take knowledge of their canles who were clean difmilled and called : and look whomsoever they judged to have obtained their discharge by any special grace and favour, before they had served on their full time by law r. quited, they would command them to be enrolled fouldiers again. By vertue of this edict of the Cenfors as also by their letters fent out and divalged abroad in all incorporat Towns and places or refort for market and mer handife, there affembled together and came to Rome such a multitude of lufty, yong, and able men, that their unufual and extraordinary number was chargeable and cumberous to the City. Thus besides the former levy taken of those that were to be sent and emploied in supply of the old armies four legions more were enrolled by C. Sulpitius the Pretor, and within eleven daies the musters were accomplished and ended.

Then the Confuls cast lots for their provinces. For the Pretors had their governments allotted unto them before, and the fooner, by reafon of the civil causes which required their jurisdictions. The one over the citizens was faln to C. Sulpitius, the other over for ainers to C. Decimius, M. Claudius Marcellus obtained the regiment of Spain, Serg Cornelius Lontalus of Sicily, P. Fonteius L. Capita ruled Sardinia, C. Myrting Figular had the condust of the navy, And then, Ifay, to Q.Servilius one of the Confuls fell the government of Isaly, and to Q Martins the other of Macedony. This Martins fo foon as the Latine feafis were folemnifed, departed toward his province immediarly. After this, upon the motion of Capin to the Senat to know their pleafure, which two legions of the new be flouid coodyst into Gant? the LL a ordained. That the Pretors C. Sulprim and M. Claudius, flouid give unto the Conful, which is pleased them of those legions that they had enrolled. This he took to the heart, that he a Contal was thus inbjected to the will of the Pretors; yet after the Senat was rifen, he flood waiting at the Tribunabofthe Pretors; and required them according to the order let down by the Senar, to affigu him his two legions. But the Prators submitted the choice thereof to the Coi, himself. This done, the Censors tooks review M of the Senat and chofe new Senators and Mic Emplian Lepidar was elected prefident of the Senat and these were the third Senators that made choice of bird consequently one after another. Seven were displaced and deposed from their Senarors dignicy. Now incaking the number of the people and in affeithing them, they compelled correturn into Marrian, the e who were departed from the army there: and by means of this affelment, they foon knew who were ablent from their companies: they examined them for what causes they were discharged from souldery; and whoseli-cence they judged not to be grounded of god and sufficient reason those they forced to take the military oath again in this manner and form: According to the edich of C.Claudiwand Tib. Sempromus the Cenfors, thou shalt well and truly fwear, to return willingly and with all thine heart, into the province of Micedan; and this that thousand thy power without fraud of covin. In N making the review of them that ferved on horseback wheir centure was executed with great rigour and extremity. They took from many their horles of tervice: apon which occasion having given offence to the whole efface of Knights and Gentlement of Rome, they blaw the coals and kindled the fire of ill-will and heart-burning against shemselves: by a certain edict of theirs besides, wherby they intimated, That none of them who in time that Q. Futuins and An, Pofthumius the Cenfors had taken to farm the revenews, fruits and profits of the City or undertaken at a price the publick works and provisions, thould be so hardy as to pretent themselves to their spear set up, either to be farmers or undersakers, no, nor to be pareners, or have any thing to do with those that were in such negotiation, commerce and bargain. The old Publicans and farmers had oftentimes complained hereof to the Senat : but when they could obtain no comfort from them; @ to moderate and absidge this infinite power of the Cenfors, at length they met with a Tribune of the Commons, one Ratiliars to fland with them and defend their cante; amon who upon a particular and private quarrel of his own was offended and bate a goudge against the Centous. And this was the occasion: They had commanded one of his late valids and enfranchiled retainers, to pull down a wall franding inchesiger Sitte over against a public kedifice i pretending that the faid wall was built upon the City ground. The man a private person, called unto

w the Tribuns for their lawful help and favours but when as none of them all but only this Ranifica would meddle in themaster and interpole their helping hand, the Centors fent to firain; and cake gages for to bind himsp answer the saule, and before the body of the people intended an action against him, and let a grievous fine upon the head of that party aforefaid. By means I fay of this debate begin upon juni en occasion, when as the old publicans betook themselves for incourage at the Tribune presents at the contract of the Tribune presents and the tribune presents at the contract of the same of the faid Tribune alone, in this form, That what publish sevenews and profits of the State, C. Claudius and T. Seme provine had to farm let for a centitor what publick works and provisions they had put out to be made and purveied at a price, the fame leafer and bargains should not stand for good but be cancelled, and new demiles drawn and made, Allo that it might be lawfull for all men indifferently B either to be farmers or undertakers of the premifies, And the faid Tribune affigned a day for a general affembly and fession to have this bill to be cast by the voices of the people. When the day was come, the Cenfors advanced and put themselves forward to dislivade and plead against the bill. So long as Graechus spike, he was heard with patience and silence. But at Claudius, when he opened his mouth, they hiffed and kept a muttering, to as he was for ed by an oies made by the crier to procure audience; which being made, the Tribune found himself grieved and complain ned, that the people thereassembled were withdrawn and called away from him, to the prejudice * of his authority and honour, and with that flang out of the Capitol where this affembly was holden. The next day he kept a great goil and made a toul fir: first, he interdicted the goods of Teh. Gracebus as condemned and accurred, for that in letting a fine, and streining gages of him. G who had appealed to a Tribune, and in not obeying and condescending to his oppositions he feemed to fer light by his Tribunes authority, and prejudice his reputation. As for C. Claudius. he arrested him to answer at a day, for that he had withdrawn the assembly from him; nay, he professed that he would indice both the Censors of treason or felony in the highest degree, and required of Sulpiting Pretor for the citizens, a day of affizes for their judicial tryal, The Cenfors refused not to have this matter put to an issue with all speed, and to be tried by the doom of the people. So the time for the hearing and determining of this hainous crime of majefty or treason aforefaid, was affigued the * daies immediatly before the eight and seventh calends of Octabers Upon this, the Cenfors incontinently afcended up into the Porch of Liberty: where after they " in mie 8 & ? had made fure and sealed the publick Registers and Records, shut up and locked all the offices by that is the Dof the Chancery, and discharged for the time the publick Clarks and proto-Notatles attending 22 and 24 of upon that Court, they protested that they would not go in hand with any publick affairs of september. flate, before the fentence and judgment of the people were passed upon them. The day came, and Claudius first pleaded his own cause and spake for himself: and when of twelve Centuries that were of Gentlemen, eight had found the Cenforguilty and calt him, yea. and many other centuries of the fift Claffes. Then presently, the principal persons of the City in the very fight of the people, changed their weed, laid away their rings, and went about from one to another in humble manuer, to crave the commons to be good unto the Cenfors. . But that which most of all either staid or reversed the definitive doom against him. was (by report) Tib, Grac-

This year at the earnest fuit of the Aquileian Embassadors unto the Senat, for to have the number of their colonies encreated; ashopland and five hundred families (by vertue, of a decree granted out of the Senate) were enrolled; and for the conducting of them to Aquileia, were fent as Triumvirs or commissioners these three, to wit, T. Annin Lusaus P. Decius Subulo, and M. Cor-Encline Cerhegus. The same year C. Popilins and Cn. Offavines Embassadors, who had been fent into Greece, having first read and published at Thebes the arest and ordinance of the Squar, carried it. afterwards throughout all the Cities of Peloponne fus, to this effect, That no perfon hould contribute toward the wars, and puc into the hands of the Roman Magistrate more than that which the Senat had set down. This put them in good hope and assurance for the future time that they should be eased of shole charges and expenses, by which they were impoverished and wasted, whiles every one imposed upon them some taxation or other, and never gave them repose In the. Achean general councelholden at Area, they had audience given them and were heard in graciopsfore: from whence leaving shis most loval and faithful matien in fingular good hope of happyestate for the time to come, they passed into Lighta. There was as yet no ledition broken out. othere : but all were in jealoufy and infpicion one of another, and full of natural acculations : in regard of which jars and troubles, the Embaliadors only demanded holtages, and without any other end made, went directly into Acarnania. The Acarnanians granted unto these Embaffadors a Dies, to be holden at Tyrrheum e where some debate was between the partakets of divers factions. Some principal men of the States, required that there should be garrisons, received into their Cities, to bridlethe wilfull folly of those that enclined to the Macedonian charbimself the other Censor: for that when the commons cried from all parts, that there was demped, he would (without attending the judgment of the people as touching himself) accompany him into banishment. Howbeit the defendant and accused person, was driven to this neer point and hard exigent of extremity, that he came within eight centuries of being cast and condemned . Thus when Claudius was account, the Tribune faid he would not trouble and moleft netions others gainfaid this course, and beforghe, the contrary, for fear left that peaceable and confederat Cities should be put to receive that difference and dishonor, which usually falleth upon the lenowise enemies and those that are conquered by torreof errors. And this sequest was beyond just. Then the Embalfadors returned to Laiff a unto Haphinithe Pro-confession in the they were emploied in embalfage. Otherwise the retained fill with him; but Population petter with a root foundars or very neer, he fent to Ambraoia, there to lodge for the white time.

Perfess in the beginning of winter durit por go forth of the dromiers of Maccounty, for fear hen the Romans would invade with violence his realm in lone place or other, if they found it would and disfurnished. But toward the mids of December about mid-winter, when by telebrosting deep from the mountains are unpallable and uninperable from out of Theffuly, thinking he had then a fit leafon and opportunity to cut off the hopes and break the hearts of the neighbor-hopderers, that when he should be averted another way and based in the Roman war, he might be t secured of danger from them: considering that from the parts of Thracia he had peace with Caysi. and likewite from Epirus fide (by the means of Cephalas, who fuddainly of late was revolved from the Romans:) moreover having newly vanquished the Dardanians in war; and seeing only that quarter to infest and annoy Macedom, which regardeth and affronteth Ilyricum; and that those Illyrians also were not quiet and at peace, but ready to give entrance unto the Romans; but if he had subdued and tamed those Illyrians which were next unto him, then King Gemins also, who a long time hung between in doubtful terms, might be induced & drawn wholly into fociety with him: he refolved at length, and with ten thouland footmen heavily armed, whereof part were Phalangitæ, and other two thousand lightly appointed; and five hundred horse, he made a rode and presented his forces before Stubera: from whence after he had provided himself of corn to x ferve for many daies, and given order that the ordinance and engine of battery should follow after; at the third daies end he lodged neer Wanna, the head City of all that Land Peneffia, But before that he offered any affault, he fent certain of purpole to found and follicit the affections, one while of the Cartains of the garrison, and another while of the Townsmen. Now there lay within the City, together with the manhood and youth of the Illyrians, a garrifon also of the Romans. And when he faw that they brought no news of any peaceable dealing from thence, he began to bend his forces against them, and assaid to invest them round about, and so to force the City. And albeit both night and day without any rest and intermission, they pressed upon the inhabitants, and evermore one succeeded another; whiles some reared ladders against the walls, others threw balls of fre against the gates, yet the defendants of the City held out and endured 1. that turious and violent tempest: became they hoped that neither the Maceconians lying abroad were able any long time to endure the rigor of the cold winter; not the King on the other fide could have so much release and relaxation from the Roman war, as to stay there and make his abode. But after they perceived once the mantilets approach, and the frames of turrets and fabricks erected, their perfittance was over-matched & they began to relent. For befides that in plain force they were the weaker and not able to refift, diffressed also they were for want of corn, neither had they flore of any other provision, as being taken on a suddain, and looking for nothing lefs than fiege at such a time of the year. Therefore when they were past all hope to be able any longer to tenth, C. Carvilius Spoletimus and C. Afranius were fent from the Roman garrison, to crave of Perfens, first that he would permit them to depart in their arms, and to carry with them their bag and M baggage: fecondly, if they might not obtain to much, that he would but give them afferience of life and liberty. The King was more free and liberal to promife, than fast and faithful to perform. For after he had commanded them to go forth, and carry with them all that was their own: the first thing that he did was to disarme them and take away their weapons. They were not to foon departed out of the Town, but both the company of the Illyrians, to the number of 500 men, and also the inhabitants of Mana tendred themtelves and their City. Perfents when he had put a gatrifon in Ufcana, led away the whole multisude of the yeelded Townsmen (and those were well-neer as many in number as his own army) and transported them to Soulera: where, after he had fent the Romans (all befides their Capeains) who were 4000 fighting men,into fundry cities to be kept in ward, and fold the Elicanians and Hyrians; he led his army M . back into Penefita, intending to be mafter of Oig:um, a Town feated otherwise commodiously, and withabit is the very key and highway that openeth passage into the country of the Labeats, within the realm of King Gentius, and where he kept his roial flate, his he paffed by a flrong bosough-Town well inhabited, named Draudicum, one about him that was well acquainted with the coasts of that country put into his head, that bootless it was and to no purpose to win Oeneum, unless he had Draudac also in his hands, as being a Town htuate more commodiously in all respects. Whereupon he advanced forward, and so soon as ever he presented his army before it, incommently all the inhabitants submitted and yeelded. Being much animated and encouraged with this intrender of theirs, which they made far fooner than he hoped or looked for after that he perceived how tetrible this redoubled army of his was, all the way as he marched he brought of under his subjection eleverrother Caffles and frong holds, upon the file teat that they were put into. Violence he nied against very lew of them; the rest yeelded willingly swherein were taken 1 ynd Roman fouldiers, placed there in feveral garrifons. In great flead and to very good ale forved Caralline Spoletime and Itheir passies, who evermore gave it out that there had been no creek ty nor rigor exercifed upon him and his fellows. Arlength the King came before Ochemb which could not possibly be won without a fet and fall fiege; For the Town had far more youth and able

A men within it then the relt, was fortified with a ftrong wall about it, and defended of the one fide with the river called Areans, and of the other with an executing high that and the fame of hard and difficult specific. All these things confidered, the cownsmen were in good hope to be a ble for to make reliffance. Perfens, having entrenched the town and call a rampler round about it, began likewife to raife a cerrace & mount from the upper part thereof, to that beight'as might firmount and over-top the wals, But during the time that this peece of work, was in hand and brought to perfection, a great number of the inhabitants within were confumed by diversand fundry adventures, whiles they skirmilhed oft and falled forth, endeavouring both to defend their own wals, and also to empeach the fabricks and devises of their enemies. And those that remained alive, what with toiliome labour night and day, and what with many a wound, were past all R fervice and good for nothing. So foon as the terrace and mount aforefaid wastaifed close unto the wall, both the Kings cohort (whom they call Nicatores) mounted up into it, and also with ladders the affault was given unto the City in many places at once. All that were above fourteen years old he put to the fword : their wives and small children he cast into prison. The rest of the booty and pillage fell to the fouldiers share. As he returned from thence with victory to Stubera, be fent as Embaffadors un to Gentins, Pleuratus the Illyrian (a banished person who sojourned with him) and Aparens a Macedonian of Berrhaa. Them he gave in charge to declare unto Genius, what he had atchieved against the Romans and Dardanians the summer past, together with the late exploits performed in that winter expedition; and withall to perswade the K. for to be knit in amity with him and the Macedoni ns. These Emb stadors having transmounted the top of the hill Scordas and traveried the wilds and wolds of Illyrians, which the Macedonians of purpose had laid walt and defert, to the end, that the Dardanians might have no cafe passage either into Illiricum or Macedony) after much pain and travell they arrived in the end at Scodra. Now W.s. K. Gentius at Liffus, and thither were the Emb. fladors tent for, where they delineted their metfage with gracious audience: but they went away with an answer to no effect; namely, that he wanted no will, and his heart was good enough to war upon the Romans; but his coffers were empty, and he lacked mony especially, to go in hand and enterprise that which he defired. This antiverthey related unto King Perfeus at Simbera, at what time as he was molt buffe in felling of his captives taken in Illyricam. Then forthwith were the lame Embaffadors addressed again unto him, accompanied with Glaucias one of the Kings guard and iquires of his body, without any n mention made of mony, and that was the only means to induce the bare and needy barbarone Prince to levy war. After this, Perfens ranfacked the City Anorra, and once again reduced his army into Peneftines country, and having frengthned the garrisons in Vicana, and in all the forts and peeces about it, he returned into Macedony,

L. Calini a Roman lieutenant, lay in guard for the defence and rule of Lyricum, who durft not fiir o long as King Persens was in those quarters; but in the end after his departure, he endeavoured to recover Fearni in the Penellins country, but was repulsed from thence by the garrison of the Maccodnians there, and earied away nothing but many adry knock and bloudy wound, & so retired with his forcesto Lychnidim; from whence, some sew daies after the sent M. Trebulius Fregellams into the Penellins country, with a strong power, for to receive holtages of those Cities who faithfully had persisted in anity & friendling-He commanded him also to go sorward to the Partins (for they like wise had covenanted to put in pledges) for that of both these nations, the said holtages might be gotten without any stir and trouble. The hostages of the Penellins were sentent to Apolloma, but those of the Partins to Dyrrbachium, which in those daies was more usually called by the Greeks Epidamsus.

App. Canduse, delirous to rate out the blemish and make amends for the dishonour received in Illyricam, fet in hand to afsault Phances a fort of Epirus, having brought thither with him the A. thamans and Theiprotians (over and above the Roman army) to the number of 6000 men; but he got nothing there but travell for his paines, by reason that the place was valiantly defended by Clevas, left there with a ftrong garrifon by K. Perfeus. Perfeus likewile madelan expedition to Elimea, and after he hadt aken a folemn furvey of his army about it, he conducted his power to Strains at the request of the Epirots This Strains then, was the strongest City of all Erolia, Situat it is upon the gulf of Ambracia, neet the river Achelous he advanced thither with 10000 foot & not above 300 horfsof them the took the fewer with him in number, by reason of the threight paiages and rugged wates. Being come at the third dates end fo far as to the mount Citins, after he had with much dificulty paised over it, the low lay lodeep, that hardly and with much ado could be find a convenient place to encampin. From thence he removed, more for that he could not there abide and remain, then for any intolerable way and weather he met withall in his difmarch and journey forward : to with palling great travell and trouble, of his bealts especially the fecondday he arrived at the temple of Impiter called Niceus, and there lodged. Then after he had taken an exceeding long journey, he abode at the river Arachibus, being trained thereby resfon of the deep water : during which time, he made a bridgover and transported his forces and when he was gone a dates journey onward, he encountred on the way Archidans; a principal perion of the Grohans, by whole means the Cit yor Strain was to be delivered up unto him. And that day he ledged apon the frontiers of Andian from whence next morrow he journeyed se firms to Strang, where having encamped near the river Achelons, he looked that the Etolians would run durinte him by heaps at all their gates, to yeeld the micives to his protection : but in flead thereof he found their gates shut & garisons of the Romans received into the City that very night when he came, together with the lieutenant C. Popilius, For the chief of the City (who induced and enforced by the authority of Archidamus whiles he was prefent in place, had fent for the K.) became more flack and negligent, by occasion that Archidamas was gone forth to meet with him, and thereby gave advantage and opportunity to the adverte faction, to fend for Positive with a 1000 footmen from Ambracia. In very fit time and to right good purpole came Dingshire. alfo a captain of the Ecolian Cavalry, accompanied with 600 foot and a 100 horie. Known is was for certain, that he marched toward Stratus, as intending to band and take part with Perfeas ; but changing his mind together with the turning of fortune, he joyned with the Romans. and banded against him for whom he fet out at the first. Neither was Popiling, among these waverings and inconstant spirits, more secured then he should be; and therefore incontinently gat a the keies of the gates into his hands, and possessed himself of the guard of the wals. And for Dingre chas and the Ætolians, together with the youth and able men of Strains , be best owed them all in the forresse, under a colour of guarding the same. Persens, having assaied to parly with them from the bils which commanded the higher part of the City, finding them perverle and obstinat, and feeing them ready to fet him farther off with thot of their darts, encamped five miles off from the City, beyond the river Pemarus. There, he called a councell; in which, Archidamus together with the revolts and renegats of the Epirots, exhorted him there to fojourn and continue; but the captains of the Macedonians contrariwife were of advice that there was no flerwing with that troublesome and dangerous scalon of the yeer, considering their provisions were not ready; and the affailants were like fooner to feel the feacity and want thereof, then the defendants in to regard whereof, and especially for the enemies wintred not far from thence, he dislodged and removed to Aperantia. The Aperantians by reason of great credit of Archidamas among them, received him with a generall conlent. And the same Archidamus was made captain there over a garrilon of 800 fouldiers. And fo the King returned into Macedon, with leffe trouble both of his men and bealts, then he came thither. Howbeit the bruit blown abroad, that Perfeus led his forces against Strains, caused Appins to levy his siege from before Phanotes. And Clevas with a brave regiment of lufty men well appointed, followed hard after him, and at the foot of the hils which were almost unpassa' le, he slew wel-neer a 1000 of them as they marched heavily armed, and took prisoners above 200. But after that Appine was passed through threights& come into the plain called Eleon, he lay encamped there fome few daies : mean while Clevas, accompanied with to Philostratus the chief commander of the Epirois, passed over into the territory of Autigonea. The Macedonians went about to rob and (poil : but Philoftratus with his cohort fet him down in await, under a covert and hidden place for the purpole. And when as those of Antigonia issued forth in arms & charged upon the forragers as they ranged over the fields, and disperied in stragling-wife, purfuing them too eagerly in their flight, they chanced to engage themfelves over far within the valley where the enemies lay in ambuilh and there to the number of a 1000 of them lost their lives, and almost a 100 were taken prisoners. And so the enemies having sped wellin all their enterprises, removed their camp close to that of Appins, to the end that the Roman army might do no violence and outrage upon their friends and allies. Thus Appear fpending the time in there parts to no purpose, and doing no good, after he had discharged the companies of the Cha-Monians, & as many of the Epirots as were with him returned in Ingress with his Italian souldiers. and when he had distributed them among the confederat Cities of the Partynians, there to winter, returned himfelf to Rome by occasion of a certain folemn facrifice. Perfeus fent to Caffandrea for to lie in garrifon there, a 1000 foot and 200 borfe, whom he had caused to come again out of the countrey of the Peneltins. And they that returned from Gentius related stillithe same long from him, yet never rested he nor gave over to tempt and importune him, sending Embassadors after Embassadors unto him, knowing right-well, that in him refted great importance: yet could not by any meanes possible bring the man to expend ought and to be at any charge, in a matter every way of great confequence.

Unitus Marrius Philippus passing through wilds and woods, entered into Meccdony and Surprised many Cisios. The Rhodians sent Embassadors to Rome, shreatning to aid Perseus, no less, the people of Rome would conclude peace and contrast amity with him: whereat was taken great Scorn and disidain. Now when the charge of this war was committed to L. Æmylius Paulus the Comful now the second time for the year following, Paulus before the publike of mely of the people presed unto the gods, that all infelicity and curfed fertime coming towards the people of Rome, might for a versed from thence, and light upon his sum house. And so having taken a voiage into Macedony. vananilhed Perlens and subdued all Macedony. A liste before he bould livike a barrel, C. Sulpiciis Gallus a Martial Colonel, fore-warmed the army that they flould not wender & be troubled in mind at the sclipfe of the moon which was to happen the next night following. In like fort Gentius the King of the Illyrians having entered again into arms, was overcome mifeld by Acicius the Preter : and havine [ubmitted bim[elf to bim, was with his wife, children and kindred, fent to Rome, From Alexandriathere arrived the Embasadors of Cleopatra and Ptolomeus King and Queen of Egypt, com plaining of Antiochus King of Syria for that he marred upon them. Perleus having folioited Euroches King of Pergamus, and Gentius King of the Illyrians to aid him, was abandoned, for that he made not true paiment of mony according to his promife.

The four and fortieth Book of T. Livius "Nthe beginning of that fpring which immediatly followed the winter wherein these occurrents hapned, Q. Martins Philippus the Conful came to Brundusium with five thousand menwhom he intended to transport over the less for the supply of his legions. And M. Popilius (one who had been Conful) and other brave gallants of noble parentage as well as himfelf. followed after the Conful to be martial-Tribunes in the Macedonian legions. Also about the fame time C. Martins Figulus the Pretor, and Admirall of the navy, repaired to Brundusum, Who weighing anchor, loofed to fee from It aly together, and arrived the next day at Corpha; but the morrow after that, they put within Actium, an haven of Acarnania. From thence the Conful fer r fail for Ambracia, where he disbarked and travelled by land to The flats. But the Pretor having doubled the point of Leneas, entered the gulf of Corimb; leaving his veisels at Crinfa, journed likewife by land to Chales unto the naval forces, making such expedition that he croised through the midft of Bastia in one day. At the same time A. Hostilius lay enc mped in Thessaly, neer to Palapharfalas. Who albeit he had performed no memorable exploit of warlike feats, yet he had reclaimed his fouldiers from all licentious loonfels, where with they were corrupted, and ranged them within good order of discipline. Also by his faithfull corraige in government, he had entertained and kept the love of the allies still, yea, and protected them from all manner of wrong and injury. Now when he was advertised of the arrivall of his successor, he affembled with all diligence his forces both men and horfe, & gathered together all armor, as well offenfive as defenfive. n and fo with a brave army right well appointed, he went forth to meet the Contal upon the way. As their fift encounter and meeting was honourable, and befitting as wel their own reputation as the greatestate of the Roman name, to for the managing of the affairs afterward[* it was very expedient to the Conful Philip. For the pro-conful turning to his own army, exhorted the fouldiers to perform valiant fervice; and so when he had delivered it to the Conful, returned to Rome.] heredetecti Some few daies after, the Conful made an oration in a folemn audience of all his foundiers: Wher- supplied, as in first he began with the particide of Perfeus, committed upon the perion of his own brother. Signius think. but projected against his very father. Then he proceeded forward and declared the wicked and chimins may divelish means whereby he attained to the crown, also his practites of poyloning, his bloudy murderers he laid await for King Eumenes his lifeby way of deteltable brigandage and robbery 1 more markes [] "over, the injuries offered to the people of Rome, and facking of affociat Cities against the cove-"nants of accord. All which dealings of his he fhould find oneday (quoin be) by the illue of his "affairs, how odious and curled they are in the fight allo of the immortall gods. For the gods are evermore favourable and gracious to piety and fidelity, the only means whereby the people of " Rome is mounted to that putch and height of felicity. Then he compared the forces of that State "which already compassed the round world, with the strength of Macedany; be let armies to ar-" mies, making remonstrances how far greater was the pulffance of Philip and Astiochus before. and yet was it defeated utterly by no greater power then the Romans now were able to finew. "Having thus enkindled and enflamed the courages of his fouldiers by this maner of exhortation. he began to debate in countel as touching the principal and main point of the whole war. And thither repaired unto him from Chaleis, the Pretor C. Martins, after be had taken the charge of the armado and fea-forces, Relolved it was and concluded to make no longer abode in Theffaly, and there to lofe time, but prefently to diflodg and remove directly into Macedony:that the Pretor also should endevour and calt, how at one and the felf same time he might infelt and annoy the fear coalts of the enemies. Now after that the Pretor was dismifted &tent away, the Conful commanded his fouldiers to bring every man with him provision for a month; and to the tenth day after he had received the conduct of the army, he removed the camp and let forward. When he had gone a daies journey, he called together the guids, and after he had commanded them every one to declare before the Councel there affembled, which way each of them intended to direct the army the canied them to go afide; and then debated it was in councel, which courie to take above all others. Some were of opinion to lead by the way of Pptbours; others advited to paffe over the Cambunian mountains, like as the yeer before Hoft live the Contul conducted his army; and there were who gave advice to go neer to the moor of Afenris. Now thereremained yet fome pare behind of the way, which lay indifferent ftill and common to all thefe places; and therefore their . confultation of this point was put over to the time when they should encamp neer to the parting and division of the said water. So from thence he led the army to Perrhabia, and sat him down between Azeras and Deliche, for to confult once again for all, which way to take

The same time Perfess knowing that the enemy approached, but yet ignorant which way he H meant to come, determined to befet all passages with strong guards. Whereupon he lent ten shouland yong and lulty men lightly armed, to the pitch of the Cambaunian hils (which the inhabitants themselves call Volustana junder the conduct of caprain Ajelepsedotus. But he commanded Hippias with a power of twelve thousand Macedonians to feiz the streights of a certainfort fitust upon the marth Afenin, and is called Lapathus. Himfelf in person accompanied with the reft of the forces, lodged first neer to Diam : but afterwards feeming as if he were unprovided of counsel and void of sense and understanding, he with his light horsmen made rodes and courses along the tirand, one while toward Heracles, and otherwhiles to Phila; and fo backward again the same way to Dium. In this mean time the Consul resolved fully to lead his army by that pass where we faid before that the army of King Philip gneamped fometimes neer a place called Oldo- I Jophas. Howbeit be thought good to fend out before four thouland armed men, for to prevent the enemies and be possetsed first of the most commodious places of advantage : this regiment wiscommanded by M. Clandius and Q. Martins, the Confuls fon , and incontinently all the terces in generall followed after. But the way was fo fleep and difficult, for ough, uneven and rigeged, that in two daies space, they which were sent before, albeit they were not charged with the carriage of anything, had much ado to march fifteen miles: where they lodged, and the place which they made choice of was called the Tower Endiern. From whence the morrow after they iournied feven miles forward and feized a hill not far from the enemies camp: where they difparched a courrier backto the Conful to give intelligence, that they were come neer to the enemy. and feeled in a place of fafety, commodious also for all purpoles; and withall to advise him for to w make all possible speed after, for to overtake them and join together. This messenger encountred (h) Conful at the Mear Afenris, where he was greatly perpirzed as well for the difficulty of the way which he was to enter himfelf; as also in regard of the danger of them whom in so sew number he had fent before, even through the midft of the enemies corps de guard. Whereupon he took a better heart to himfelf; and having united all his forces, encamped upon the forefaid bill which his men already held, on that fide which (confidering the nature of the ground) was most commodious. And there they might discover within the view of eie, not only the enemies camp diltant from thence a little above a mile, but also the whole countrey as far as to Diam and Philas vea, and all the fea-coast by reason that the high pitch and top of the mountain yeelded a prospect far and neer round about. And this was it that let on fire the fouldiers hearts, when they beheld !. the whole weight of the war; the Kings forces altogether, and the enemies country to near note them. In which spirit of cheersulness when they were earnest with the Consul, and exhorted him to advance directly against the enemies camp, they had but one day granted them to rest after their wearssome journey So upon the third day the Consul leaving part of his forces to guard the camp, led the rest against the enemy. Now had Hippias been lately fent from the King to keep and guard the passage, who since the time that first he espied the Roman camp upon the hill, had prepared the minds of his men to a battel, and so encountred the army of the Conful and met it half way. The Romans advanced forth to fight, nimbly appointed; and the enemies likewife were lightly armed, and by reason thereof most fit and provided for to give the charge and begin skirmish. So soon as they affronted and encountred one another, presently they fell to lancing M of their darts on both fides. Many a wound was given and received of the one part as well as the other by their rash charging at random, and few of both sides were slain. Thus were their slomacks whetted and edged against the morrow; and then had they skirmishes, and maintained fight with greater forces, and more deadly feud, if the ground would have lerved themto have displaced their battallions at large : but the top of the mountain was streight and aroseto a therp creft in form of a coin or wedg; and ihardly afforded room enough for three ranks of armed men affront; and therefore when fome few were in fight, all the reft and specially they that were heavily armed, stood as lookers on. As for the light armour of one part, they would run forth at the broken crags of the hill, and ever from the fides join battel with the like of the other part : yea, and find meanes to charge their enemie, were the place even or uneven, it skilled not N whether, But after that more that day also were wounded then killed, the night at length parted the fray. The third day, the Roman Generall was to feek and wift not what to do ; for neither could be stay any longer upon that hill, for want of all things; and retire back from thence it was not possible, without dishonour and danger both. Moreover, if he had retired, the enemy might presse upon him from the upper ground with advantage. There remained therefore no other meanes toamend that which was the audaciously enterprised, with as resolute & hardy perfishance in execution; a thing that other whiles proveth well in the end, as if it proceeded from wife and deliberat counsel. And verily to this hard passe and difficult terms they were come, that if the Conful had been to deal with an enemy like to any of the Macedonian Kings in old time, he might foon have received a great foil and overthow. But K. Perfens as he coalted and ranged with his O cavalry upon the strand neer Dium (albeit for the space of 12 miles wel-neer, he heard the cries and shouts of them that were in fight;) neither reenforced the companies by sending fresh souldiers in place of the wearied, not shewing himself in person at the battel: (which had been a thing I assure you of most importance) whereas the Roman General being above 60 yeers of age, corpulent besides, &unweldy, performed bimself right lustily all military services of a valiant warrior; perfiking in that to the very end most bravely, which he had begun and enterprised so boldly :

and having left Pepileus forth gound the hill son, malled over places that had no tracks at all to di-Let them, by funding out before, estably were allowed the property and property indicate and the complete an tibetinen with baggage, came behind with the legionary toot men in the tereguard. No tongue is able to express what a toil and printal labour they found in going down the hill, the sumper hories with theichacks & carriages tambled to down one with another; in to much as when they had fearcely gone four miles forward, they wilhed in their hearts nothing more then to return the way they came, if it had been possible. The elephants troubled the march as much in maner as the enemies could : for when they were come to a place where they could lee no way, down B they call their riders and governors; aying them along on the earth, and with the horrible brave ing that they made, affrighted their hories especially, until such time as a device, was found for their paff ge. They began first to make the head or entrance of the bridg at the very bow and edg of a fteep downfal : this done, in the lower ground beneath, they lettalt in the earth good firong and long posts of wood, two by two distant one from the other traverse, while little more then the largenets of one of their beafts. Upon which refted fast joined [with ten on & morteife] certain rafters like wal plats 30 foot in length, and those being couched with planks croffe over in form of a bridg, had earth and mould call thereupon. A little way off heneath it, such another bridg was made; and fo a third likewile, and many more confequently according as the craggy ground was broken and uneven. Now the elephant from the firm ground entred upon the first bridg aforefaid; but before he was gone as far as to the foot and end thereof, the polls showen as med were cut in two underocath ; to the end that the bridg might fall, and in the calle reeling therof the beaft also gently flide, as it were, and be carried therewith as far as the head of the fee cond bridg. Thus some of them glid and kept themielves standing upright on their feet others relta ed upon their buttocks. Again, when they were come to the plain and levell floor of another fuch like bridg, by the fall of it in maner aforefaid they were driven, unto a third bridg beneath it, untill flich time as they were come to a more plain and even valley. In this order the Romans could rid little more then feven miles that day. And the least part thereof went they upright on their feet but were fain most-what to tumble and roll over, nd over with the armor and fardels about theme. and thus they gat forward in all kind of pain and trouble, in such lost that he who induced them to this journey & conducted them therein, could not deny but the whole army (with a mal power coming against them) might utterly have been defeated. By night they arrived at a prety plain. but the place being enclosed on all fides, they had no space and room to view round bout, whe ther it were dangerous or no. At length after much ado and beyond their expectation, they meewith a firm peece of ground, whereas they maight take fore footing; and there they were forced the morrow following to attend in the hellow valley the coming of Popilins and the companies left with him; who allo were exceedingly fore vexed and plagued with the roughnesse of the way, about the enamies, troubled and afrighted them no whit at all. The third day, after they had joined their forces together, then took their way, through a pade, which the inhabitants call Caltipence. The femrits day they paffed over a slace; that had no more meanes to direct them, then the other before; but by ule and experience there were grown more skilfulls, and better hope they. had, for that the enemy in no place appeared, but approached neer to the fea. When they were come once down into the plains between Haracetas and Lebethras, the footmen (whereof the greater part kept the hile) puched their tents and took up the valley, and a good part of the plain greater par kept the hist. picked their tents and took up. nier, and a good part of the plain wherein the horimen should quarter. As the King was by thing himself, it is faid that word came, How the enemies were neer at hand a st, which pews he was foliated, that he lept out of his bathing vessel, and in hast gat him out of the bane, stying sloud. That he was vanquished without drawing sword and stoke given a neither with he for fear which was to turn him, taking sundry-counteds one of nothers, and commanding he known not what. One time this rate of the late when for the late when for the late when for the late when the late this means opened all the success for the Romans to make war. Himtelf, after be had had in tais means opened all the sysques for the Romans to make war. Himlelf, after he had had in great halt belrowed and piled up in his hipsy all the gilded images at Draws, to the end that the, enemy, thould make no pripe, of them, couled without level possible to traffe up and to remove to Pratus 3 8 thereby gave occasion, thus the enterprile of the Could, which might have freezed ratheness, the had engaged himlelf to far, that he could not polyibly, to retire again without leave, of the enemy proved in the end, op inconfidents and onastried defignment. For now the Roman had, the choice of two passages through which thay might cleape away, the one, by Tempe into, Thirds, the other into Maccalon, by the way, ner Draws both which before were held by the Rims sourch So as it without a state of the state of the red of the product of the state of Kings guards. So as it retolute and testicis captain could have held out and endured but one ten aics the first apparence and shew of terror that approached the Rom, could never have returned into Theffely by Tempe, oor found way for copyrelance of provision & victuals to the place where they were. Here is now, not reason way or experiment to provide a commandation place water they were. Here is not force of a rare to make it dangerous, and why befides the traight guiler five mile in length, yelding a very arrow, way, for one beaktrong obserged with burden, the policy of either hands are to there and upright, that hardly a man is the tolook down from their, but his else will daily, his brate turn, and his head, be giddy within! Moreover, the found and notice, see, and the depith of the river ference running dial rectify.

rectly through the midte of the villey, energied the fear is much the more. This place to peril H lous of its own natura the been field and address with the Kings gurifons in four leveral of diffant places. But as they come down and were not different, to being now deferred. they could not possibly have gained them again in spen view; confidering that the enemies had poffelled the tops of the mountains ; and no doubt the difficulty thereaf befides, which they had r tried already, would have cut off all hope of that adventure : to as being waded thus far into this rath enterprife "there remaineth no meanes elle for them, but to have palled through the middle of the enemies, at Diame, for to to elcape and patte into Macedony, an adventure no doubt, lif the gods had not bereft the King of his right wits) most difficult and dangerous unto them. For it being to, that from the foot of the mountain Olympus unto the fea, there is little above a mile ipace between : the one half whereof, is taken up with the mouth of the river Baphyrus, which in this place (preadeth very broad and large; and another part of the plain; either the temple of Jupiter or the town it felt occupieth a the reft belides, being but a very small place, might have been enclosed and made fast against them with a little trench and rampier besides such store there was of stone ready at hand, and of timber out of the forrest, that they might either have raised a w mure, or framed turrets and fuch like fabricks in their way. Barthe K. (whole printend undertlanding was blinded with uddain fear) forefeeing none of all their things, but disturnishing every fort of their garrifons, made open passage for the current of war, and fled himself to Pydia. The Conful perceiving that he had gotten great advantage and many hopes by the folly and negligence of his enemy, dispatched a currier backtoward Lar faunto Sp. Lucretius, willing him to leiz thole forts into his hands about Temps, which were abandoned by the enemy and after he had lent Popilins before in spiell' to discover all the passages about Dinm, and perceived that the avenues were open in all parts, he marched forwards himfelf, and the fecond journy came to Diam , where commanded to encamp under the very temple, to the end, that no vidlent outrage frould be committed in that holy place. Himfelt in proper person entred into the City, which as I it was not great, to it was garnished with fair publick baildings, beautified with a number of goodly images, and palsing well fortified befides : in fo mitch's he could not well believe, that things of such importance were abandoned for nothing, but that there was some fecret deceit and treachery lutking underneath. After he had flafed there one full day; to etpe and the that all coalls were cleer, he diflodged and inherenced on & tuppeding verily that he flould be provided of infficient flore of grain, he advanced forward that very day to the river named Mysis! The morrow after, he took post sign of the City Agasta, which the inhabitants willingly sendred into him. And to win the hearts of all other Macedonians (contenting himself only with hollages) he promifed to leave their City cleer without a garifor, and the permit them to live under their own laws without paiment of any tribute. Being marched on ward one daies journey from thence, he pitch-M. ed down his tents falt upon the river Affordir: but feeling and finding ftill (the faither he went from The field, more and more wint of all things, he retired back to Dism; and then all meniaw plainly Stande no doubt to what freights he thould be driven; in cale he had been clean flux out from The field, confidering that it was not lafe for bindo remove far from thence wherehe was Perf. as having railied all his forces, and assembled his captains into one place, checked and

The Conful after he had discovered a far off from tea a freet of Reman ships, conceived good hope that velsels were coming charged with provision of victuals for now in his eamp the dearth N was great, and brought they were already to extream want and fearcity.) But he was advertifed by them who were entred within the habor, that the halks and fifthe of burden were left behind at Magarifa. Whereupon, being in great doubt while to do fio hard went all things with him for the present; that he had work enough to wreftle with that Boly difficulty, without being farthet encumbred with any empeachment from the enemy) behold; is happy time, letters were bre unto him from Sp. Lucretins, importing thus much , That he was malter of all the fores and holds planted upon Tempe and round about Phila, where he had found great plenty of corn and other necelsaries. The Conful right joious for thele good tidings, fet his army on foot from Diam to Phila, as well to ftrengthen the gatrilon there, as also to deal corn among his fouldiers ; which would have required a long time ere it could have been brought over to them at Dissus.

That departure & journey of his was nothing well poken of the foregave out that the General retired from the enemy for very fear; because that if he had stated there still, he should have been forced to a battel; others said, that he had no shill in war; neither in show occurrents, which for tunes wheele turning about altered every day, offering one new thing or other, who when occations and opportunities were prefented unto him, let the fame flip out of his hands, which loop after might not possibly be recovered again. And verily he had not to foon quitthe possible

Anf Dinm, but he started and wakened the enemy, and put in his head no wat length to regain those matters, which had been loft before through his own default. For hearing that the Conful was deperred, he returned rumediately to Dism's where he repaired whatlo ever had been demolifhed and ruinat by the Romans - the battlements of the wals which were cast down he set up seals in the right place; and in all parts fortified the muce and bulwarks of the City. Which done, he encamped five miles off on this fide Empens, intending that the river it felf (which is very hard to be passed over, should serve in stead of a rampier and erench of defence. This river moneth one of the vale from under the mountain Olympus, and in fummer leafon is small and shallow, but in winter it tileth high and ipre adeth broad by reason of rain v running also with a forcible current and freem, it furmounteth, great rocks, and among those frony crags and fhelves make h many B whirlpits : by occasion likewife, that from thence it carrieth away, with it into the fea, ftore of earth, there are many gulfs of exceeding depth : and by reason that it bath eaten a hollow chanell in the mids, the banks of each fide are very high and freep upright. Perfens, supposing that by the means of this river, the enemies were debarred from all passage, purposed in his mind to hold off, and drive out the relt of the fummer in that fort. But the Conful in the mean while fent Popilius from Philainto Heracles with 2000 armed fighting men. This Heracles standeth about five miles from Phila, situat in the mid-way between

Dism and Tempe, upon arock that commandeththis river, Popilius, before that he caused his men to approach the wals, fent certain persons of purpose to perswade the magistrats and chief of the City, to make proof of the faithful protection and elemency of the people of Rome, rather Other to trie their rigor and violence. But this motive and advice availed not, because they might differenthe fires out of the kings camp neer to Enipent, whereupon both from the land and feafide (for the fleet also being arrived anchored neer the shore) as wel by force of arms as by fabricks and engins of battery, they began to affail the town Moreover, certain young and lufty Roman fouldiers (makingule now in wat of exercise which they had practised in the games Gircentes) gat over the wall where it was lowelt. The maner was in those daies (before this wast prodigality came up of filling the whole cirque or thew-place with beats fet out of all countries) to devide and feek fundry forts of publick fights & spaciacles to be hold; & not running one course with the chariot, and another on horieback, and io an end, to employ at both races the space of one full hour. Among others feats of activity exhibited, the mafters and wardens of those exercises and h games brought into the race commonly 60 (and other whiles more) lufty yong men in arms well appointed. There training in part represented a shew and apparance of two armies encountring and encountring and charging one another, in part also the use and practite of a more gentle and elegant exercise then military profession, and coming never to the handling and managing of weapons after the order of tword-fencers. Thele youggallants, after they had performed other ordinary running couries, put themselves into a four-iquare squadron, with the bucklets or targets close couched and joined together over their heads, in this manner a they that were formost in the front frood bolt apright; the feeond rank flooped fornewhat lower under the other; the third course more then they ; and so the fourth untill the hindmost kneeted on their knees : and by this means they relembled a pavoided rifing up higher & higher like the pent-house or roof of additices. E This done, two men well armed fetching their run fifty foot or the reabout back ward from thence, and feeming to defie and challenge one another, mounted the forefaid pavoifade, ran from the nether end up to the top upon those targets to jointly united and fet close and thick together, and one while they fet their counteriance as though they would defend the fides and edges thereof, otherwhiles in the mids they feemed to performed their devoir and maintain combat one with another, as upon firm and fleady ground. Like for all the world to this, was there a pavoilade framed and brought close to that part of the wall, and when armed men were mounted upon it, they that flood upon the very ridg thereof, were as highfull as the defendants which kept the walls who being once beaten back and turned down, two enligns of fouldiers gat over into the City, The only difference between this pavoisade and the other above described was this, that they on-Ely who thood in the front before and in the flanks, bare not their targets aloft above their own heads, because their sides and bodies should not be naked and exposed to hurt, but earied them before after the usual manner of figuring men in a barrell. By which means, neither the arrows, and darts dicharged from the wall bure them afront; nor the thet that light upon their targetfence took any hold, but glanced and glid down-ward from the top without doing any harm, like to vain water that shooteth from the ridg of an house, and runneth down the eyes. The Confal likewife, now that Hwaden wer won; advanced forwards with his army thither, pretending as though be marched toward Distor, and usif after he had chafed and driven the King from thence, he minded to puffed forward also into Pires. Bit preparing now against winter, he commanded to make the water fit and handloine, for the carriage of provision out of Theile-

G fo, and to chale out commondious places for garners, allo to baild servain houses, wherein they this brought she provides, might lie in cover, and lodg commedically. Nicias was not fo provident and well advised at Pella, 11 in throwing away fome part of the mony which he there found a howbeit he thought his fault fuch, as might in some fort be remedied and ametaded; for that, all the faid treafers in manner was recovered by the means of certainty years that filted for it under water, and fetch it ap from the bottom of the fea. But the King himfelf was to athanned of this foolith fear, that is, an elapseholly he commanded those poor dyvers to be feeresty murdered; yea, and afterwards singless and Nicias allo; the end that no person should remain alive that was privy to that so this commandent of his.

Amids thefe affairs. C. Martius having loofed to fea from Hexacles, and with his fleet failed to The flatonica, landed his armed fouldiers in divers places of the shore, and made wast in the territory all about and when they made fallies out of the City and charged upon him, after fome for tunat skirmilhes, he chaled them back and beat them within the wals. So as at length be terrified the town it felf ; but not only they who ranged up and down here and there, unadvisedly approached the wals, were wounded with thor discharged our of instruments of all forts, planted upon the wals; but those also who were in the ships, were burt with stones, weighed and levelled from engins a far off. Upon which occasion he commanded his fouldiers to retire a shipboord, and leaving the fiege of The falonica, they passed from thence to Enia, a City fifteen miles off, fituate in a fertile foil just over-sgainst Prdna, When they had spoiled the territory lying to that City, they coafted along the shore and arrived at Antigonia. Where, being set a land, first they spoiled the countrey in every quarter, and brought good store of prizes to their ships; but afterwards, as they stragled out of order and difbanded, the Macedonians, as well footmen as horse, ran upon them, and chaied them as they fled apace to the fea fide ; in which rout they flew about 500 and took as many priloners. And nothing elie provoked the courage of the Romans (in regard as well of utter despair otherwise to save themselves, as of the indignity it self, soto hazard their honour)but only the extream necessity wherein they flood, having no means tore. cover their thips in fafety. Whereupon they turned head, and renewed the fight upon the very les strand. They also who were a shipboord, surccoured and helped them. In which consist, two bundred Macedonians loft their lives, and as many were taken prifoners. From Antigonea the fleet weighed anchor, & made head toward the territory of Pallene, where the fouldiers were feton shore to spoil the countrey. The territory appertained to the confines of the Cassandreans, the most fruitfull track of those parts which they had coasted and failed by. There King Enmine, being departed from Elea with twenty war thips met with them, & likewife five other covert thips were tent from King Prufias. The Pretor teeing this good encrease and addition of his forces. took a better heart unto him, even to beliege " Caffandrea. This City was built by King Caffander, in the very fireight & gullet which joineth the territory of Pallene with the reft of the Macedomian countrey, enclosed of the one fide with the Foronian fea, and on the other with the Macedonian. For there lyeth out a bank or shelf like a torque into the fee, upon which the City standeth, and beareth unto the deep, no leffe in compette and quantity then is the mountain Acke. It butteth full against Magnesia, with two promontories of unequall bigness; of which the greater is called Polidenm; the leffe Caraffrium. This town they began to affail in two divers parts. The Roman (P retor) drew his fortifications to a place called Cista, appoint certain firong forked thakes for to debar and that up the way from the Macedonian teato the Toronian. On the other had fide there is an Euripe or arm of the fea, from which quarter Eumenes gave the affault. The most trouble and toil that the Romans found, was in damming and filling up the trench, which Perfens had caft against them a little before. And as the Pretor enquired where the earth was bestowed which was thrown out of the trench storefaid, because he could see no heaps thereof any where, there were shewed unto him certain vaults and arches within, which bewraied a new wall, not built to the thicknelle of the old, but with perpend work, laid with one course of brick and no more. Whereupon he relolved to pierce through the faid wall, and to to make way into the City. The which he thought to execute and perform without being discovered, in case he scaled the wall in another quarter, and by making a shout and alarm there, witherew all the defendants of a the City to the guard of that one place. There lay in garrifon at Caffandrea (being a sufficient number of serviceable young men of the City) eight hundred Agrians, and two thousand Peneltins of Sclavery, tent from thence by Plearatus : and both thefe nations are hardy warriors. Whiles their defended the wals manfully, and the Romans endeyoured, with all their might to mount over, the thin wals of the vaults and arches aforeisid were wrought and digged through in the turning of an band, and gave entrance into the City. Now it they who brake in, had been armed (as they were but pioners) the town had been taken at that inhant. But when as the fouldiers heard news that the faid work was finished, they inddainly let up a cheerfull shout for joy, being ready some in one place and some in another to rull, into the City. In enemies at the first wondred what the thone place and tome in another to thin, into the says and enemies at the first wondres what the meaning should be of that findship try a but the captains of the gartifun, Pythe and Philippu Pyes to being once advertised that the town lay open, uppoing that herein consider the vantage, who could first prevent the other and give the charges, fallign forth with a frong band of Agrians and Allyrians: and while the Romans tallied themselves from the from this place, and others from that, and were called together for to enter the City with banner difplaied, they fet upon them unready as they were, and not ranged in any good order, put them to flight and chaled them as far as to the trench, where they overthrew them one upon another by heaps: 600 or very were there killed

A and in maner whom they could reach between the wal & the trench were fore hurt. The Pre thus overtaken in his own enterprife, was not fo halty to project any new defigns; neither fined Eumenes any detter, albeit at one time he affaulted the City both by land and fea, Wherupon they accorded both, to fet firong guards for to impeach the passage of all garrisons out of Maceday thit bers and (fince open force took no better effect) to affail the wals with fabricke & engine, As they were bulie in preparation thereof, there arived ten frigots of the Kings, tent from Macedony with certain felect auxiliary Gauls. Thefe when they perceived their enemies ships riding at anchall siled in fingle range one after another, as close as possibly they could to the shore in the dark night, and to entred the City. The bruit that went of this new fuccour and garrison, forced as well the Romins as the King to give over the fiege; lo fetching a compate about the promontory, they B arrived before Torons. And when they began to lie against it, after they perceived once that there was a valiant company there to defend it, they abandoned their enterprire without effect, & failed to Demetrias. Being approached thither, and leeing the wals full of armed men, they paifed by and, anchored at Ioleon: intending after they had spoiled the territory, to set upon Demen trias. Mean-while, they Conful alfo, because he would not fit ftill doing nothing in the enemies countrey, fent M. Popilius with five thousand fouldiers to give the affault to the City Melibas. Seated it is at the foot of the mountain Offa, on that fide which looketh to Theffat, and very fitly for the purpole commandeth Demetrias. The first arrivall of the enemies put the inhabitents of the place in great affright; but after they had recovered their foirits danted with fo unexpected fear, they ran in arms to the gates, and up to the wals, where they doubted and inspected any place like to give entrance, and incontinently cut off all hope from the enemies, that it could poffibly be forced at the first assault. Whereupon they prepared to lay fiege unto it, & began to make fabricks and engins to batter the wals. Perfeus having intelligence, that in one inflant both Melibes was belesguered by the Conful, and allo that the fleet anchored before Isless, to the intent that from thence he might go in hand to assail Demetrias : fent Euphraner one of his cantains. with a chosen regiment of two thousand souldiers to Melibaa; with this charge and direction. That if he could raife the fiege from Melibes and force the Romans to depart, he should march fecretly to Demetrins, & put himfelf within the town, before the Romans could remove from Jolcos and advance before the City. The affailants of Melibaa discovering him with his forces all at once upon the higher places, quit their fabricks and engins in fearful halt, and let them all on fire : D and thus they departed from before Melibea, Emphranor having levied the fiege from the one City forthwith led his army to Demetrias. And then the citizens afsured themfelves, that they should be able not only to defend the City against the fiege, but also to fave their territories from wast and fooil : and fo they made fallies upon the forragers dispersed loosly here and there, not without drawing bloud of their enemies. Howbeit the Pretor and the King rode about the wals, and viewed the fituation of the town, if peradventure they could espie any one place which they were like to force, either with battery of engins or force of arms. The voice went, that by the means of Cydas the Cretenian, and Antiochus governor of Dometrias, there was a treaty of peace and amity between Philip and Eumenes. But howfoever it was, this is certain, both Eumenes and the Pretor departed from Demetrias. As for Eumenes, he failed to the Conful, and teltified unto him E the joy that he conceived for his late and prosperous entrance into Macedon; and from thence returned to Pergamus into his own realm. But Martius Figulus the Pretor, when he had fent part of his fleet into the harbor of Sciathus there to winter, with the reft of his flips went to O-, ream in Bastia : supposing it a commodious City, from whence victuals and all provisions might be fent to the armies that abode either in Macedony or Theffaly. As touching Emmenes, fundry authors have written diverily. If a man should go by Valerius Antias and believe him, he reporteth, that neither the Pretor had any help from him by his navy, not withit anding that oftentimes he had tent for him by his letters; nor took his leave of the Conful in good terms with favour, at what time as he was to depart into Afia, as being highly displeased, that he was not permitted to quarter with him in one & the same camp; infomuch as he could not possibly be entreated by him. to leave behind that Cavalry of Ga ils which he had brought thither with him. As for Attalns his brother, heremained ftill with the Conful (as Valerine laith) and continued syncere and faithful unto him without any change and alteration; yea, and performed right good, fervice in all that war.

During these wars in Macadony, there came Emballadors, from beyond the Afpt to Rome, fent. from a pery K, of the Gauls (Balanes he had to name, but of what linage he was descended it is not recorded) promiting aid to the Macedonian war. Thanked they were from the Senat, and prefents were fent noto them : to wit, a chain of gold weighing two pound certain golden cups of four pound weight, a brave courier barbed and trapped, and an horismans armor. After their Gauls were gone out of place, the Embassadors of Pamphylia brought with them into the Senat a golden crown, valewed at 20000 Philip-process of gold t their requelt was, that they might.

C be permitted to fet up the faid prefent and oblation in the chappell of Imp. Opt. Max. and likewife to facrifice within the Capitol. Their petition was ganted, and when their Embalsadors. were delious to renew the amity between them and the Romans, they received a gracious anfwer, and had of them a reward fent of two thousand Alses. Then the Embassadors of King Priva fias, and anon after, others from the Rhodians had audience; who of one and the same argumentdiscoursed diversity; for both tended to one thing, namely, a treaty for reconcilement of peace between the Rome & K. Perfens. Prafin feemed to intreat rather then to demand protesting that he " had ever to that day flood with the Romans in that war; and willingly would friend them fill it to the very end thereof : but fince that there came Embiffadors unto him from Perfent, and " dealt with him to make an end of the war between him and the Romans, and for that he pro-"miled them to be a mediator and interceffor for him to the Romans : therefore his request "unto them was (if they could so find in theirs hearts) to flint their anger, & so they should nie "him in any fervice, as one that would acknowledg himself beholden unto them for afavor, in "effecting this atonement and reconciliation. In this maner (I fay) spake the K. his Embassadors. 66 But the Rhodians contrariwise, in a proud humour of theirs, reckoned up a beadroll of their "demerits towards the people of Rome, attributing the greater part (believe me) of the victory of K. Antigebus to themselves : moreover they added and said, that when the Macedonians and "Romans were at peace, they began to enter into league and amity with K. Perfeus: which they " had interrupted and discontinued against their will; not upon any desert or occasion given of "his part, but only because it pleased the Romans to draw them into the affociation of the war. "Three daies now already (fay they) have we felt the finart of this war and lived by the loffe; by " reason that the seasare shut up from us, and our Hand is decaied and distressed for need and " want, having loft our tollage and customs issuing from the seas; which we are not able to en-"dure any longer; have addressed Embassadors to Perfeus into Macedony, to intimate unto him, "that the Rhodians will and pleasure was, that he should grow to a comp ofition and be at " peace with the Romans. free : and presently were letters dispatched to both nations to signifie so much unto them. Which they sent a reward to these Embass, to every one of them 2000 assessibut none would they receive. After this, were the letters read of Q. Martins the Con'ul, conteining thus much, namely, How he had passed over the streights of the forrest, and was come into Macedon, where he had provision of victuals which the Pretor had given order for out of other places to ferve for winter and besides, had taken up of the Epirots twenty thousand Modii of wheat and ten thousand of barley, for which corn they should make mony ready at Rome to content their Embassadors, N. Also that they must send from Rome souldiers liveries and other apparel; and need he had besides of 200 horse or thereabout; especially of Numidia; for in those parts he had no plenty of any thing. Hereupon an act was granted out of the Senat, That all these things should be done according to the renor of the Conful his letters, So C. Sulpition the Pretor bargained for the transporting over into Macidony of 600 fide cassocks and 3000 short coats or jackets together with horses; for to be disposed and distributed at the discretion of the Consul : and besides paid the Embassadors of the Epirots good mony for their grain. He brought also into the Senat. One simus the son of Pythoa noble personage of Macedony. This man was evermore of counsel with the K perswading him to peace: and admonished him as his father Philip before him observed an order even to the time of death to read over twice a day from point to point the instrument of the accord & cove- O nants between him and the Romans; so he also would take up that good custome and practise the same, if not so continually, yet at least wise many a time and often. Bur when he could by no meanes scare him nor avert his mind from war, he began at first to withdraw and absent himfelf, alledging for his excuse one while this occasion, and otherwhiles that, because he would not be present at the debating of those matters which he approved not and in the end perceiving

A that he was had in some jealonsie, & other whiles charged to be a traitor, he changed his allegeance revolted to the Rom, and served the Conful in right good stead This One smar being brought into the Senat house, related all these premisses : whereupon the Senat ordained, that he should be enrolled formally in the number of allies : also, that he should be provided of a lodging, and his ordinary expences for the time allowed at the Cities charge Moreover, 200 acres of land in the teritory of Tarentum, which was conflict to the people of Rome, should befet out for him; and meffuage in Tarentum bought for his habitation. To fee all this performed, C. Decimus the Pieter

He canfed like wife the stately palace to be built, which afterwards was called Semmonia Bafilica. Now was the yeer come about and well neer at an end, when by reason of the great care prins c cipally about the Macedonian war, men began to talk, whom they were to create for Confuls against the next yeer to atchieve and end the faid war? Whereupon there passed a decree of the Senat, that Cn. Servilins with all speed possible, should make hast to Rome for to hold a general assem. bly of election. This decree Sulpitius the Pretor within few daies after read to the Cof, to the end that he should repair home into the City before the day prenxed. Wherupon both the Col, hairned; & the faid election was also furnished by the d.y appointed. Cost, these were created, L. Emplus Panlus the fecond time (even 14 yeers after bis former Confaithip) with C. cicinius Craffus. The day following were the Pretors also chosen, to wit, Cn. Bebins Tampbilus, L. Anicius Gallus, Cn. Oftavius, P. Fonteins Balbus, Mar. Ebutius Helva, and C. Papprius Carbo. The carefull regard of the Macedonian war canfed every thing to be done with greater expedition. And there-D fore it was thought meet, that these new elect magistrats should call lots out of hand for their provinces, that it might be known to whether Cof. Macedony, and to which Pretor the conduct of the navy should fall , that thereupon they might presently consider and provide for all things requisit to the war, &require theadvice of the Senat asneed required. O dained it was when the Confuls were entred into their office, to folemnize the Latine feltivall holidaies as foon as they might conveniently, without offence of the gods and breach of any religious order, that the Conful whole let fell togo into Macedony, were not deteined behind upon any occasion. After these ordinances, Italy and Macedony, were nominated for the provinces of the two Coninls; and for the Pretors the two civill jurifdictions within the City of Rome, the navy, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia, In fine. Macedony fell to Emplins the Conful, and Italy to Livin us. Of Pretors, Cn. Babius was lord chief justice of the pleas of citizens, and L. Anicins of aliens. And if the benut mought good to fend the navy any whither, Cs. Offavius had the the charge thereof as L. admirall. P. Fonceus was anpointed by lot L. Deputy of Spain, M. Ebutius of Sissly, and C. Papyrine of Sardinia.

All men foon faw, that L. Empline intended not to go coldly about the managing of that war . both for that he was not an ordinary man, but fingular above all other, and also because that night and day be muled and studied upon nothing elfe, our that which was requisit and pertinent there-. unto. The first thing of all where with he went in hand was thes; a request to the Senat for to difparch certaindelegar commissioners into Macedany, to visit the armies there and thearmado: to make true report upon their certain knowledg, what was needfull to be done for the supply of the forces as well by land as ica ; also to lie in eipiall & estimat as much as possibly they could the p Kingspower; moreover, what quarter of the province were taken by our men, and which the the enemies kept; whether the Romans lay encamped ttill within the fortest, or if they were patfed beyond the streights and come into the even ground ; who continued trusty allies, who were, fuspected, who hung in doubtfull terms, as whose faith depended upon fortune : who seemed to be professed enemies how great the provisions were of victuals from whence they were conveign-

ed by landsfrom what places transported by water: & I ftly, what exploits had been done the fum-

mer palt both by land and fea : supposing, that for a light given and certain intelligence delivered of thefe things, he might be fure'y directed in the calling and Hying of future plots & deligoments, So the Senat granted out a commission to Ca. Servilins the Col. for to lend the delegars into Mascedeny, luch as L. Emylins thought good of. Whereupon within two dates after, Cn. Domithe Encharbus and A. Licivius Nerva, took their journey as legats and commissioners. News G came in the latter end of this yeer, that it rained itones twice, namely in the territory of Rome, and likewite about Veis : and therefore a novendiall facrifice was celebrated. This yeer there died certain prieits, namely, Pub. Quintiling Varus, a flamin of Mars, and M. Cland us Marcellus a Decemvir,in whose room was substituted Cueus Oft avins. And now noted it was, that the maynificance and port of the people of Rame encreated, for that in the plaies called Circenfes exhibited by Publins Cornelius Scipio Nafica, and Publius Lengulus Addites Cutule, three core, and

2 wild healts out of Africk, with 40 hears, & elephants, were baned to make front to the people. When L. Amplins Paulus and P. Licinini erered their Confulthip upon the intechtiof March. which was the beginning of the yeer following, the LL, of the Senat werein great expectancy, and especially what the Consul would propose unto them artenehing the Maccomian war, which was his proper province. But Panilly that the had nothing to propound and put to councel, feeing that the Delegats aforefaid were not retirned : And at Brundufium (quoth he) they now are, having twice in their voiage upon the feateen driven back by tempell and call noon Dyrrhachium; But io foon as I am once advertised and have perfect knowledg of those things that first are to be known, I will then confult; and that will be within very few daies. Now to the end that nothing may flay and hinder his journey, he told them, that the even before the Ides of April, was appointed for the folement of the latine featival holydaies. And after facilfice duly performed [upon the Albane hill] the Senat flould no fooner ordein, but he and Co. Off norms would fet forth and put themselves on their way. As for C. Lieinius his colleague, his charge foould be in his abience to provide and fend all things requifit and needfull for this war. Mean while (quoth he) the embassies of forrain nations may have audience given. So when he had facrificed as the maner was, before they took in hand the great affairs of State, the Embaffa. dors of Alexardria, from King Prolomen and queen Cleopatra, were called in. Clad they were in poor array, the bair of their head long, their beards fide and overgrown ; and carrying in their hands branches of the Olive-tree, they entred into the Sen t, and fell groveling and profitst upon the floor. Their habit and appared was not to simple and mournful, their look and counterfance not jo heavy and forrowfull, but their speech was more piteous and lamentable. Antiochus now w King of Spria, and who had iometime been hoflage at Rome under a colourable prefence of honesty and equity to restore Peolomans the elder to his Kingdom, made hot war upon his yonger brother, who then held Alexandria : and after a victory obtained in fea fight neer Pelufium he made a bridg of hasty work upon the river Nilss, over which he transported his army, & now laid fiege to Alexandria: to as by all likelyhood be would shoully by way of conquest be lord of a most rich and wealthy Kingdome. In which regard, these Embassadors made pitifull moan and grievous complaint, " befeeching withall the Senat, of their aid and fuccour to that realm and those Kings, who were such friends to their feignory and dominion. For perswaded they were that "the people of Rome had done to much for Antiochus in particular, & were of that account & authority weth all other Kings and nations, that if they would but fend their Embassadors to inti-" mate thus much, that the Senat was not well pleased with waging war upon confederat Kings, "he would pretently raile his flege, depart from before the wals of Alexandria, and withdraw his army clean away into Syria. But if they protracted the time long and delaied thus to do, then " should Prolomess and Cleoparta within a while be driven out of their realm, and forced to come " to Rome with some shamefull spot of dishonour to the people of Rome, in that they had notifet " their helping hand in that extream danger of all their fortunes. The LL of the Senat moved with compassion at the prairies of these Alexandrians, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, and A. Hoftitur as Embafladors to determine and make an endof the war between thosel two Privees. In commission they had first to go unto Protomens, and then to Amicebus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased and gave over arms, they would take him neither for friend nor confederate, whom it was long of that the war was not given over. So these M three together with the Alexandrian Embastadors, took their leave within three daies & departed. Then the forfaid Delegats returned from out of Macedony, the last day of the featival games to Minirva called Quinquairus, and not before they were welcome; for fo looked for they were, had it not been eventide when they came, the Confuts would immediatly have called the Senat together. But the morrow after the Scriat fat, and those commissioners had audience given. Report they made first, that with more danger then profit enfuing, the army entred into Macrdo. nover those passes and streights, wherewas no way nor passes at all Item, that the King kept the countrey of Pieria, into which the Roman armie was now advanced, and were to necreocamped one to the other, that nothing but the river Enipsus between kept them alunder; that neither the No K. made offer of battel, nor the Rom, were of sofficient strength to challenge & force him to fight: moreover, that the winter had overtaken them (a time unleasonable for warlike exploits) that the fouldiers were nuzled and nourifhed in idlenels, notwithflanding they had victuals to ferveno longer then fix dates; also, that by report the Macedonians were thirty thousand strong. Were it fo that Ap. Claudius had a good and fulficient power about Lychnidum, he might be able to trouble the K, and put him to his trumps in a battel; but now both Appins and the garrison with him, are themselves in extream jeopardy, unless with speed either a complete army be sent thither, or elfe they draw from thence where they are, into Mucedony, Over and befides they related, how from the camp they went towards the fleet, where they heard fay, that fome of the fea-faring men and mariners were dead of fickness, others, and namely, those of Sicily above the rest were gone home again to their own houses, infomuch as these were not men enow to serve the ships & those that remained, had neither their wages paid & mony to put in their purte, nor liveries & apparel to hang on their backs. As for Eumenes & his fleet, they (like ships driven to a coast by force of wind and weather, without any other errand or caute elfe) were come and gone again , and it fremed the mind of that K. was not wel felled and refolved. But as they reported al of Emigraes fullpictoully & in doubtful terms, to they alsured them of the firgular fidelity & conflancy of Artifac

A his brother. When these Legats had spoke then said Le Emplient et us debate now in council ms trouter, when there is no the many and the state of the sense of th but fuch as had born some bonourable dignity : then, out of all those Eribures thus elected that L. Emplies should make choise for those two legions which were to go into Macedon, of whom he would himself: also, that after the solemnity of the Latine feafts performed, L. Engling the Conful and C. Offavius the Prator and Admirall of the fleet, should depart into their Province. A third was joyned in commission with them, to wit, L, Anicius the Prator and L, chief Justice for firangers. And ordained it was, that he should pass into Illyricum about Lichnidum, for to succeed R Ap Claud us. The charge of taking musters was put upon C. Licinius the Conful. He had commandment to enroll feven thousand [foot] Citizens of Rome, and two hundred horsemen and to charge the Latine allies with a levy of seven thousand footmen, and four hundred horse. Also to fend letters unto Cn. Servilius, who governed the Province of Ganl, to enroll fix hundred men of arms. This army he had commandment to fend with all convenient speed to his Collegue into Macedony, so as in that Province there should not be above two legions, and the same full and compleat, containing fix thouland foot, and three hundred horse aprece. As for the surcrease as well of the Cavalry as Infantry, they should be disposed and bestowed in sundry garrisons. And all such as were unmeet for service, were to be cassed and sent away. Moreover, the allies were put tolet out and find 10000 foot, and 800 horse. And those were to serve in garrison under Anici-C us over and above the two legions (which he was commanded to lead into Macedony) confilling

of 5200 foot, and 300 horsemen either of them. Also for the navy were enrolled 5000 mariners and rowers, Licinius the Cof. was appointed to defend and kep in obedience his Province with two legions, and to take besides of allies ten thousand soot, and six hundred horse.

After these ordinances of the Senat were accomplished, L. Amylius the Col, went forth of the Senat house into the common place before the assembly of the people; where he made a speech unto them in this wife following: "Me thinks I perceive and fee, my good friends and Citizens The Oration " of Rome, that ye have shewed more apparent tokens of joy and gratulation inmy behalfsfor that of the Angline

Oftavius departed incontinently into Macedony. It is recorded in the Chronicles that the Cof, was honoured with a greater frequency that accompanied him than ufuelly had been known; and that men prefaged in manner affuredly, the end of the Macedonian war; how the Cof should have a speedy return, and obtain a brave and glorious triumph.

During these occurrents in Italy, Perfess who (because he was to be at the charges of disbursing money) never thought of it, to go through with that which before he had begun, namely, to adjoyn unto him Gentius King of the Illyrians: fo foon as he perceived that the Romans were chtred the straights, and the war come now to this extremity of hazard; thought good now to make K that fure and put it off no longer. Whereas therefore he had covenanted & promifed by his Embaffador Hippias three hundred talents of filver, with conditionallo, that for fecurity hoffages should be put in of both parties interchangeably; he fent Pantaucus one of his most trusty friends to dispatch and make an end of this affair. This Pantaucus met the Illyrian King at Medeon in the Country of Labeatis: where he both took an oath of the King, and also received his hostages. Gentins likewife fent his embassadot, named Olympio, to demand the semblable oath of Perfeus, and require hostages accordingly: with him were certain persons sent of purpose to receive the money, who also by the advice of the said Pantaneus were to go in embassie with the Macedonians to Rhodes: and the men hereto appointed were Parmenio and Morcus. But they had in charge and commission after the oath taken, after hostages & money received, to go to Rhodes, & not before. L. Good hope they conceived that the Rhodians might be follicited and induced to take arms against the Romans, by using the name of these two KK, at once and this account they made that if this State which carried the renown and honour above all others for fea-fervice, would once combine and band with them they should leave the Romans no hope at all, either on land or sea. When thele Illyrians arrived, Perseus departed with all his Cavalry from before the river Enipeus where he was encamped, and encountred them near Disim. There were all the complements performed according to the covenants, in the fight and midit of the Cavalry, whom the K, of purpole would needs have to be prefent at this accord of affociation made between him and K. Gestint, inppoling that it would comfort & encourage them the more. So the holfages were given and taken in the presence of them all. They also who were to receive the money were sent to Pella M where the K. his treasure lay: and those that should go to Rhodes with the Illyrian embassadors had comandment to embark at The falonica, Now was Metrodorus there, lately come from Rhodes who affired them by the means of Dyon & Polyanatus, two principall personages of that City, that the Rhodians were press and ready to war. Whereupon the said Metrodorus was appointed the chief in this embassage of Macedonians and Illyrians together. At the same time likewise was addreffed and imparted both unto Eumenes & also unto Antiochussinch advice and counsel in common, as the present condition wherintheir affairs frood, might minister & afford argument mathely," That a free City and a K, were two; by nature, enemies that possibly could not fore together: "That the people of Rome went in hand with them feverally one after another & (that which was " a greater indignity & unsupportable) used the force of KK to overthrow the state of KK Porto, N " by the aid of Assalus they had brought his sather Philip to mintby the field likewise of Enmoner," " & partly alfo of his father Philip, Amiochis was defeated; & even now against himself both En-"menes and Prulias were put in atms. If the kingdom of Macedon, were puce subverted have at " Afia next; which the Romans have in tome part feized already for their own under a colour " of enfranchizing Cities, & fetting them free: & then they will not leave until they have Spin " too. For now is Prusidi preserted in honour before Eumenes; & Antiochassor all his conquet is "chased &debarred out of Leypt, which ought to have been the recompence of the war by him "enterprised & atchieved In these regards Persons advertised each of them to confider & provide therefore either to force the Romans to make peace with him, orelie to hold them for the common enemies of all KK, in case they perfuled fill in so unjust a war. The commission that the ent- o baffadors had to Antiochus was apert & open: but unto Eumener an embaffatior was fent under a precence of ranfoming certain captives but pra Aifed there were under hand more fectet domplots; which caused Emmens even then to be inspected & odious unto the Romans, yes, & charged afterward with more grievous matters, although unitally. For he was reputed little better them a traitor & a professed enemy to their state, whereas indeed both he & Perfess strove who could compals, insprize, & overtake one another better infraud & avarice. Now there was one Cyler a Gresenti-

A an inward & most lecret triend to Enmener, that map had communed full at Amphipally with one Chim are a countrionan of his who lerved under Perfess in the wars , and afterwards at Demetrias conferred with another named Mener are allo with a certain third perion called Antiqchan, all captains to K. Perfenteven under the very wals of the forelaid City, Over and befides, E. ropon who at this time was lent, had beforetime been employed in two leverall emballies to the fame America. These secret communications and embassages were badly spoken of; but no man knew what was concluded between the two KK Howbeit, thus the cale flood; Eumener as he had no mind nor intention to war upon Perfem, fo he was not defirous in his heart that he should have the victory of the Romans; not to much for the old enmity which had been between both their fathers as for the hateful quarrels kindled among themselves. For this concurrence & emu-R lation there was between thele two Princes, that Eumenes could neverabide to fee Parfeus for to purchase so great wealth & so much honour, as he must needs acquire by the conquest of the Romans he faw moreover, that Perfeus from the first beginning of this war lought by all means possible for peace, & the nearer he was to danger & damage, aimed thereat every day more than other; employing his whole study & care about nothing else. He perceived also that among the Romans because the war grew to be longer than they hoped and looked for, as well their captains as the Senat were well enough content and very defirous to see an end once of so troublesome, hurtfull, and difficult a war Knowing thus as he did, the mind and will of both parties, he enclined & framed to that which of it felfashe thought might fall out, where the fironger was weaty and the weaker in fear, and hereindeined be to thew his double diligence, thereby to win a thank & pur-C chale favour of both parts for he entred into bargain with Perfess for a tum of money, one while not to aid the Romans either, by land or lea ; another whiles to be a means for peace and to treat with the Romans thereabout, and not to meddle at all in the war, but to fit fill : he capitulated (I fay) for 1 500 talents; making lemblance and thew, that for the affurance both of the one and the other ready he was not only to fwear but also to put in good and sufficient host ages. Perfeus was the willingest man in the world to set in hand with this as being driven thereto by the exigent of fear; and presently without delay dealt with him as conching the hollages which were to be received: and in fine concluded it was, that they flaould upon their delivery and receit be fent into Creet, But when they came once to talk of the money aforelaid, he hafted and truck at that : and Creek, But when they came, oncero talk of the money storeland, he hatted and stuck at that and to say a truth either of these two sums (between Princesses) to great name and shonour) was but a to say a truth either of these two sums (between Princesses) to great name and shonour) was but a to say a truth either of these two sums (between Princesses) to great name and shonour) was but a to say the expense of to much money; masty, he laid, that he possesses, and the receiver, he were you should not be the expense of to much money; masty, he laid, that he possesses, was willing enough to be at the expense of to much money; masty, he laid, that he possesses make the seventh of the complete of the to fay a truth either of these two sums (between Princes of see at name and honour) was but a pieces lo god J paid down atorchand, and a footman five and their Captainal houland. with what gifts of apparell, filver, and horfes, he purposed to receive and entertain their Captains H at their first coming unto him: as for that f sy they) we finall take knowledge the soft when we are in presence personally: but now for this time, we demand; Whether we have been we you in ready coin according to bargain, that gold which is to be paid to the southers, as well horse as foot? And when he could make no answer thereto, but was set nonplate; then the said Cloudieur their Prince, Go your waies then (ad. he) and tell your King and Matter, that the Cauls unless they may receive the gold, and holtages befides for their fecurity, will not through food forward Relation being made hereof unto the K, he called his Council: and when it was foon feen what they all would advise him to dothimself, who could skill better to keep his money together. than hold the royall estate of his kingdom, began to enter into a discourse of a distoyalty and savage nature of these Gauls; making remonstrance, how he had experience by the calamities and losses of many before him, that dangerous it was to receive so great a multitude of them within Macedony, for fearthe Gauls would be found worse neighbors than the Romans were enemies. Five thouland horsemen are sufficient (od, he) and so many well we may have good use of in wars, and need not be afraid of them for their number. But every man faw well enough, that it was the waging of such a number that he seared and nothing else : but when no man durit give him counfell albeit he feemed toask their advice, Antigonus was fent again with a meffage unto the Gauls, That the King flood in need of five thousand horsemen and no more; as for all the reft; he weighed them not. When these Barbarians heard that, all the rest began to mutter and grumble, yea, and to take great fcorn and indignation, that they were levied and departed out of their native country for nothing : but Clond cus redemanded, Whether he would make present pay to those five thousand according to covenant, yea, or may? but seeing that he was to seek, and made shifts to avoid a direct answer he let this deceitfull messenger go his waies, and did no harm unto his perfon (a thing that Antigonus himself would scarcely have thought could possibly have been:) And fo after they had given the waste unto those parts of Thracia which lay near to their way, they returned back again to the river Ifter. Which power of men, it it had patied the ftraights of Perrhebis into Theffaly against the Romans (although Perfess had not flired at all, but fitten fill at Eniveus) might not only have spoiled and laid bare the territory all about, and empeached the Romans for expecting any victuals there, but also destroyed the towns urterly, whiles Perfeus held the Romans play at Empess that they could not felieve and succourthe Cities of their allies and confederats. Nay, the very Romans should have enough to do to look unto themselves, confide-L ring, that there was no tarrying for them, after that The fall was loft, which nourished and maintained their army and pass forward they could not possibly, having the Macedonian camp to affront them. But Perfeus by that deed, as he confirmed the hearts of the Romans, for he qualled not a little the courages of the Macedonians, who depended upon the hope and expectancy of their aid By the same milerable pinching of his he estranged also the heart of K. Gentiar from him. For when as at Peda he had paid 300 talents unto those that were sent of purpose from Gentiarto receive the same, well content he was that they should feat up that money. Afterwards he sent unto Pantaueusten telents, and commanded him to deliver the fame to the K, in perion : as for the reft figued up with the leal of the Hlyriams, he commanded his own men who had the convoythereof, ingoing with the least of the anythmass of commanded in sown men who has the course thereby ingoing with the totake finall jointings, and when they were come to the utmost frontiers of Management of the whole of the mediangers from him. Which when Perfess once heardy he had enougheed thought verify that the training had cone that, whereby of metality he must be fored to wage war with the Romans; and thereby on the first had not be carriage of the fored distinct as at it he had numbed and hobins for nothing more than to referve as great a body as possibly he could; for the Romanis of being the could for the Romanis of being the could for the Romanis of being the could for the Romanis of being the what had been contrived fecretly between them!! A in the rode of Sigaum. From whence they croffed over to Subora, an Ifland lying between Elva and Ather. It fortuned, that the motrow after the fleet was artified at Subma, five and thirty lifes which they call Hippagoga [ferving for the transporting of hotfer] which came from Elea, having aboorderstain hotelens of Gauland their hories, made head toward Phinza, a cape or promontory of the Chians, from whence they might cut over into Marsthony. And their were incident whence they might cut over into Marsthony. And their were incident from the menes to Astalus, Antenor being advertised by a figuall given him from a watch-tower, that those Thips were discovered under fail in the openies, loosed from Subota; and between the cape of Erythraa and Chias, where the fea is most narrow; he encountred them. The admirals of K. Eumen's thought nothing lefs, than that any fleet of Macedonians were abroad in those seas; but imagined one while they were Romans; otherwhiles, that it was Attalus or fome lent back from Attalus, B who from our of the Roman camp were failing toward Pergamur, But as they approached nearer; they took knowledge by the form and fashion of their pinnaces who they were, by their halfly rowing also and making head full against them they were out of all doubt that their enemies were at hand. Then were they mightily afraid as having no hope to resist and withttand them, consider ring the ships were unweildy and unhandsome, and the Gauls besides could hardly brook the very lea wishout any other trouble. Some of them therefore, who were nearer to the firm land falved themselves by swimming to Brythras; others set up their fails, and being cast upon the Island Chios, fortook their horfes, and ran as fast as they could for refuge to the City. But the barks dicharged their armed fouldiers neater to the City in a more commodious place for landing, where the Macedonians overtook the Gauls and flew them; some in the way as they fled, others before the very gare of the City, being kept out and excluded from thence; for the Chians not knowing either who fled or who pursued, had shut their gates upon them: Nine hundred *Gallogreeks, or * Now the very near loft their lives and were hewn in peeces, and 200 taken alive. As for the hories, part Gallo, Gallo, perished in the sea after the ships were split and broken, and the Macedoniaris haught and cut the tians, and Gala firings of their gambrels of as many of them'as they found upon the shore. Twenty of the best one, inchis and faireft hories, together with the prisoners. Antenor commanded that those ten barks which book; athe had fent before, should transport to The fadonics, and return egain with all speed to the sleet, for though Ling. that he would expect their coming at Phane. The fleet flaid about three daies under the City trimber of lence offered from one to another. And therefore, as well Romans as Macedonians, and befides, the failers and mariners of K. Bumenes converted together, intermingled one with abother in the Temple, and the religious devotion of the place yielded them truce and furcease of hostility, Antendy the admirall of K. Perfess, when he was advertified from the watch and lentinell, that certain ships of burden were seen 4 far off in the sea, set sai & made after them himself with pare of his pinnaces, and part of them he beflowed in wait among the Cyclades, and laving those that B directed their course toward Macedony, he either drowned or spoiled themall. Popular did the best he could, and Edinenes with his strips likewife, to lave force; but the Macedonians, who laled by night with two or three pinnages at the mott deceived them and were not discovered. Much about this time the Macedonian and Illyrian Embaffadors came together to Rhoder, who carried than greater authority and credit with the Rhodians, by reason not only of the coming of their bilgantins, which failed to and fro ranging over the Egean fea, and among the Cyclude, but also by the conjunction and who cation of the two KK. Now, we've the Baffanism confederat allies of the Romans: and therefore when they were first follicited by medienteres vield they resolved rather to endure a siege than do so. As for Caregianius he was practably and friendly received at his first coming into Durium, a town of the Cavians: but Carananti another City made the gates fast against him: and as he gave the waste to the testitory about it, certain of his fouldiers fragling here and there, were by the peafants and villagers killed, who came forth and made head against them,

And now by this time Appins Claudius having taken with him, over and above his own army the auxiliaries of the Bullians, Apolloniats, and Dyrrhachians, dillodged out of the place where I he had wintered, and encamped near the river Ganufuus. For hearing of the alliance made between Perfeus and Gentius, and incensed besides with the outrage committed upon the Roman embassadors, whom Gentius put in prison, he resolved certainly to war upon him, Anicius the Prator being at that time at Apollonia, and advertised in what terms the affairs flood in Illyricum, difpatched letters beforehand to Appins, willing him to attend at Genusuus for his coming: and so within three daies after came himself to the camp there; and to those aids which he had of his own he took with him two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, drawn out of the worth and flower of the Partins. Of the Infantry Epicadus had the conduct, and Agathus commanded the Cavalry. With this power he prepared to go into Illgricam, principally for to levy the siege before Baffania: but this defign projected by him, was empeached by a bruit that was blown of certain & pinnaces which wasted and spoiled the sea-coasts. A seer they were together of eighty fail. tent from Gentius by the infligation of Pantaucus, to forrage the territories of Apollonia and Drrrhachium. Then the fleet Which being jurrendred, they tubmitted also and yielded themselves. And so consequently other Cities of that country one after another did the semblable: and the inclination & disposition of mens minds that way, was much fet forward by the clemency and justice of the Roman Prator which he used toward all. Then they marched to Scodra, the capital place and feat-town of the war: not only for that Gential had seized upon it for his own self, as the chief strength and fortress of all his realm, but also because it was the strongest peece of all the Labeats nation, and very difficult for access. Enclosed it is with two rivers: to wit, Clanfala which runneth along the East fide of the Ciry, and Barbana on the L West, arising out of the march Labeatis. These two rivers joyn in one, and are discharged together into the great river Oriendes: which springing from the mountain Scodenes, and encreased fill with the confluence of many other waters and rivulers, falleth at length into the Adriatickies. This Scodeus is the highest hill by odds of all other in those quarters : on the east it hath Dards. nia under it, on the South Macedony, and Illyricam on the Well, Albeic, this town was fixougly fituat, by the naturall fite of the place, and defended by the whole nation of the Illyrians and the King himself in person: yet the Roman Prator (excouraged with the good success he had at the first, and supposing the fortune of the total war would be answerable to so happy beginnings, and that a sudden terrour also would serve him in much stead and prevaile) approached the wals of the town with his army ready embattelled, and displaied his banners against it. Now if they had at thut their gates, and defended their wals and turrets over the gates, with armed gnards befrowed accordingly, furely they had repulsed the Romans from the walls, and defeated them of their enterprife clean: but they issued forth of the gate, and in the plainand even ground gave battell with more animolity and courage than they maintained it with periffente. For being discomfited and driven back, and in the chale hudled by heaps together as they fied, after 200 & above were flain fifthe very flraight entrance of the gate, they put the reft within in fuch a frighte, they diseased continently fent unto the Practor as Oracros, Tentions and Ballus, the principal performed first parties and intreased of arms, than in the mean while he might debare in comfell and be advised as conching themain efface of his affairs. And when for this purpose he had obtained a grane for three daies, and the Romans lay encamped from the City half a mile : Gen- N fin rook a burge, and failing along the river Bartana, passed into the lake or mar of the Labeats, as if he had sought some secretary place to consult in But as it appeared afterwards he was moved upon a certain vain stope of his brother Caravantius his coming, who was said to be near at hand accompanied with many thoulands of fighting men, whom he had levied and brought out of that quarter into which he was fent But when this sumont was over-blown & vanished to nothings down the river he went again with the fiream the third day after inthe fame wallel to Scodingard for contriers before him to the Prator, requiring leave to parter 8 commune withhim; which being granted, he entred into the camp. " affiltants unto him: as for such as are not called to be of his counsell, they ought neither in pub. H  like nor in privat to shoot their bolts and give their advice. Three things indeed the soldier was to care and provide for namely to have a body most strong and nimble withall; his armoe and weapons decent and fit; and thirdly, a spirit prompt and ready at all affairs to execute any "commandment on a fudden. For all things elie he ought, to know, that the gods immortall and chis Generall will take care: for almuch, as in that army wherein the fouldiers, the Conful, and "chief commander, fuffer themselves to be carried away with rumours and bruits of the common fort it is not possible for any thing to go well forward & come to good effect. For his own part " (according to the duty and devoir of a captain General) he would endeavour and provide to "give them the occasion and opportunity of brave exploits: as for them, they were not to enquire after any future thing; but so soon as the signall is given, then every man to perform the service a of a doubty fouldier and valiant warrior, After their good precepts and infirmations, he diffinite fed the affembly: and the old fouldiers themselves conjessed commonly in plain terms, that they had taken forth a lesson that day as young and raw novices, yea, and learned in military profession that, which they never knew before: neither shewed they only by these and such like words, with what content and general liking they heard the Cof. his speech, but also testified the same by prefent deed and visible effect. For immediatly, you should not have seen over all the camp, one man idle and doing nothing: some sell to whet and sharpen their swords; others surbished their headpieces.buffs, and beavers: some scoured their shields and bucklers; others their cuiraces and corflets; some fitted and buckled their harness to their bodies, and tried how they could beflir their limbs and rule their joynts under it : fome shook their pikes and couched their javelins; others brandished their swords and lookt that they were sharp at point: So as a man might easily perceive by them, that upon the first occasion presented of encounter with the enemy, they would enter into conflict, either to atchieve a brave victory, or to die an honourable death.

Perfess also on the other fide; perceiving that upon the arrivall of the Conful and the begining of the pring together, the Roman camp refounded and tung again with their firring and ruffling of armour, as if there had been some new war towards: that they were dislodged from Phills and encamped upon the bank just over against him: and that now their leader and commander rode up and down to view and behold his fortifications and works, to (pie (no doubt) fome way * Namely, the or other for passage

> About the same time the Rhodian Embassadors came into the Rhodian camp, with the very fame charge and commission as touching peace, which at Rome had set the LL of the Senat in exeeeding heat & choler; but far worle andience had they in the councill of the camp & with great ter discontentment. And therefore when some advised, that they should be thrust out by head and a shoulders without any answer at all; the Cos, pronounced, That he would shape them an answer after fifteen daies, and not before. Mean while (that it might appear what a gooly reckioning was made of these Rhodian peace-makers who came about a pacification) he began instead thereof to debate in Councill as concerning the means and manner of making war. Some were of opinion (and principally the elders and ancients) to give the affant, and force the munitions and defences planted uponthebank of the river Enipeus; for that the Macedonians were never able to refull; if they came upon them luftily and charged them by thick troops : for whith no longer ago (lay they) than the year before, diffeized they had been of fo many holds both higher and better fortified and the same holden with strong garrifons; Others were of mind that Of warthe Admiral should with the fleet fail to The flatonica & by laying waste the maritime coasts to the off & wear kenthe kings forces : 10 the end, that upon another war showed from behind at their backs, the K. might be withdrawn & trained about to defend the heart of his realm and thereby forcell in Tome fort to open & lay naked the passage over the river Enipent; And Off avin Minkli war of this judge menty, that the bank as well by the natural fite thereof, as for the fcorees made upon he by mans hand, was unimperable and not to be gained: & befides the engins planted every where therespon he heard lay, that the enemies bad she flight and skill to diftharge all kind of find fat better and shope more dead fure thur the intention of the General Ametias was wirelly bent and ther way and after he had diffolved the affembly of his Council, he salled and his the Merchanis'of the Perchabians namely. Then the guides, who were to conduct them in their way, had commandment, so to cast their gifts and journeys that by three of the clock in the morning the third day, they might affail Pythoum. Himself in his own person the next morrow, R with intent to amuse the K and keep him from all regard of other enterprises, early by the break of day began to skifmith with the enemies guards in the very midt of the chanell and place of the current. The light armour and forlorn hopes as well of the one side as the other, maintained the fight: for it was not possible for souldiers heavily armed at all peeces, to skirmish in the chanell, fo uneven as it was. The descent from the banks on either hand to the forelaid chanell contained. fomewhat less than three hundred paces, or little better than a quarter of a mile: the middle space of the stream between / hollowed and eaten with the curtent, in some place more, in others less) took up little above a mile.
